

HE SWEARS REVENGE.

Brother of the Murdered Guard in Pursuit.

Portland, June 14.—On the train which arrived here last evening from Salem was Charles Ferrill of Reno, Nevada, a brother of Guard Ferrill, who was murdered by the escaped convicts Tracy and Merrill on Monday morning last. In conversation with the Journal correspondent on the subject of his brother's death and his own intentions, he said:

"Yes, poor Frank was my brother. I have just come from his grave, and I have made up my mind to take the trail of the devils who killed him and to stay on it till either they are dead. It was a brutal, cowardly murder. If they had only given him a chance for his life I wouldn't care so much, but they shot him in the back like the dirty cowards they are, and so help me, I will never leave their track till I meet them and when I do meet somebody is going to die," and Ferrill's square jaw came together with a snap that showed he was in dead earnest.

HAD A REVENGE.

"There is a peculiar thing about this business," said he. "You probably know that I am connected with the prison at Reno. Well, all last Sunday night when I was on watch I felt queer. I felt heavy and depressed as though something was going to happen. When I went home after my watch was over, I could not sleep well, and I told my wife that I thought I could see my mother crying. I knew that something was going to happen.

"Well, I went to bed and tossed and turned for an hour or so, when I heard a knock at the door. My wife answered it, and when I found a boy's voice, I recognized it as the voice of the man who had killed my brother. I got up in a second, and went out of bed in a jump. When I went into the other room my wife was standing there with a telegram in her hand, crying. She offered it to me and I said, 'Never mind I know what the matter is. Before I looked at it I knew Frank was dead. It's a queer thing isn't it?'"

"I at once gave leave of absence, and with my wife started for Salem. When I got to the prison and found out how poor Frank was slaughtered without a chance for his life I could have cried, but I can only find that I'll make them pay," and Charles Ferrill's dark eyes flashed in a way that belied his to the escaped desperadoes.

"What course will you pursue?" was the next question asked him.

"As to that I hardly know. You see, there are three others and myself in the party, and we will probably make independently of the party. My idea is that the best thing to do is to get ahead of those fellows and to be in wait for them. In that way we will have the advantage of them, and while I mean business, I don't intend to throw my life away if I can help it. We will strike in from Hubbard tonight and try to head them off if possible, but you can bet that if they are once located in the brush I will go in and fight it out."

At Hubbard Ferrill left the train and was joined by his friends on the platform of the depot, and in a few minutes the little party were on the way to the scene of the chase, bent on exacting a terrible vengeance.
