A strong current of dark, muddy water is flowing down the Willamette, the effect of the heavy rains that have fallen at the headwaters of the river for several days past. While the river is rising rapidly, no fear is felt of a freshet that will cause damage. It takes more than a few days of rainfall to cause a high stage of water, and the prospects are that the present flood will run out before another comes in. At the same time, river men are watching the situation closely, as this is the time of year when the Winter freshet usually comes down.
