A letter from George T. Myers, Jr., superintendent of the Oregon fish and game exhibits at St. Louis, to his father, says that the Oregon exhibits are now all installed and are attracting much attention. The weather heretofore has been wet and disagreeable and the attendance has been small, but with the advent of pleasant weather the attendance has greatly increased and all having charge of exhibits are kept busy answering questions. "Homer Davenport has been several days here," the letter states, "and has been taking in everything. He was at my exhibits several times, and said to me, well Mr. Myers, your Oregon exhibits of birds has certainly skinned any other collection here. I felt flattered by a compliment coming from so distinguished a bird fancier, who has the largest collection of wild and tame birds in the United States on his farm in New Jersey. The Oregon state building looks grand and is admired by everybody for its design and beauty, and is filled from morning until night. General Superintendent Wehrung and his daughter have their hands full entertaining the many visitors that call. I visited the building yesterday, and seeing the demand made upon him, told him I would not take his job for $500 a month. Mr. Wehrung has been assiduous in his work, and deserves commendation for his success in getting the Oregon exhibit so well arranged. Other states have more money to spend on their exhibits and have a greater amount, but in quality I think all our Oregon exhibits will excel. I am waiting to hear of your sending fresh and canned salmon."

The Shamrocks are considerably crippled, but will be alright in a few days with the addition of several new players. His left arm is in such a condition that it will be impossible for him to do justice on first bag. He will still look after the business end of the Shamrocks.

Bradley, the older favorite, will release third bag to Nader until he has recovered from his injuries and Willie O'Day, the general utility man for the State League, will occupy second for a time.
