Bass, the Bullfighter, Was Captured In the Transvaal.

Was Sentenced to Be Shot and Had a Narrote Escape From Death-Other Exciting Adventures.

Ernest Carlton Bass, the American bullfighter, who killed Don Manuel Cervera in St. Louis recently in self defense, was one of Jameson's raiders and a close companion of the erstwhile Montana miner who laid the way for the conquest of the Transvanl Remarkable Career of a Character of the Ozark Region.

Began With Cattle Stealing. Is Charged Now With Responsibility For Several Fatal Shootings.

Rather than face an Arkansas jury and stand trial for shooting a neighboring farmer Bill Naves, one of the most desperate men the Ozark region ever produced, decided to serve a sentence of four years in the Missouri penitentlary. Naves was convicted at the January term of the Howell county circuit court of felonious assault. He was sentenced to four years in the penitentiary and pending a hearing of the could be produced to convict him of case by the supreme court has been out on bond. A few days ago, when the Arkansas authorities secured a req uisition from Governor Dockery for Naves, the mountaineer chose the smaller of the two evils.

Naves has led a reckless life. His home is near Pontiac, in Ozark county where for a number of years he has re sided with his invalid mother and two sisters. When only twenty-one years old Naves was convicted of cattle stealing, an offense more serious in the Ozark region than any other crime. For this breach of mountain law he served st his neglect. These acts of vandalism continued until the owner of The summer is ended; we shift from the cattle remarked that "he was going to turn Bill Naves loose on the guilty parties." On the evening of July 3, 1901, a man on a gray horse rode from the timber country on North Fork. Within an hour two men fell at the doors of their homes and a boy lay dead on the ground. Bill Naves was accused of the crime. The first person shot on the wild night raid was Ike Lantz, whose home is in Marion county, Ark. He was called to his gate just at dusk and found Bill Naves on a gray horse. As Lantz came to the gate Naves slowly turned the horse until the muzzle of a the trouble between Cuff and his wife, shotgun resting across the pommel of she claims, was on account of his frehis saddle was opposite Lantz's body. There was a sudden report, and Lantz fell to the ground badly wounded.

Naves then put spurs to his horse and rode away. Lantz sent his son, Frank Lantz twelve years old, to the home of his uncle, Samuel Hillhouse, a mile distant, just over the state line, in Baxter county, Ark., to tell of the shooting. The boy found Hillhouse and his wife in the barnyard milking. Just as he began telling his story he saw a gray horse standing behind a cedar tree pear by. Thinking it was Naves, all ran for the farmhouse. The boy was in the rear. Suddenly a shot rang out, and Frank Lantz fell dead at the door

It was scarcely dark when Jerry Jenpremium at the kins, living in Ozark county, about two miles from the scene of the shooting of the Lantz boy, was called to his door. As Jenkins stepped outside some one shot him in the breast with a load of bird shot. Jenkins says it was Naves who did it, for he recognized his voice when he called and saw him

Then came the Marion county authorities, who wanted Naves for shooting Ike Lantz, father of the murdered boy. Naves was taken to Yellville, but his wealthy relatives secured his release on bond. Upon his return to Ozark county Naves was arrested by the authorities there for the shooting of Jerry Jenkins. Again his relatives came to the rescue with their wealth

Public sestiment in Ozark county was against Naves. His attorneys took he case to Howell county on a change of venue. When it came up for trial there in January more than 100 witnesses were in attendance. All had made the journey of sixty miles in covered wagons, many bringing their cooking utensils and victuals, prepared to camp for a week or longer. The trial was the greatest known in the history of southern Missourl. Naves was found guilty of felonious assault and sentenced to four years in the penitentiary. An appeal was granted to the supreme court, and pending the appeal Naves was released on bond. He returned to his Ozark county home.

When the Arkansas case against Naves was called at Yellville, he did not appear for trial. His bond was declared forfeited. Then the Arkansas authorities secured from Governor Dockery a requisition and started after Naves. The fear of facing a jury of Marion county mountaineers caused Naves to conclude that four years in the Missouri penlientiary was preferable to a term on the Arkansas convict
