A Winter Tale.

When old winter's tale of whiteness falls upon the dust brown land With a gentle, soft politeness, Hiding all the grim and mad, Then instead of going sleighing Down the avenue in style We are apt to be displaying Faces merrily by the mile.

When the ice on lake and river Lies as smooth as polished glass, Skating? No, we shake and shiver; Nothing can our woe surpass. Hoarsely do we moan and mutter As we chill and gnaw and scow, Coughing as each word we utter, "Kindly pass the mustard, please."

When the fierce north wind gets busy With the stuff that he can mix, We, with influenza, dourly, Don't appreciate his tricks. Then we do not care to listen To the tale the poet tells, Singing that the snowflakes glisten, Singing of the chiming bells.

When our aching teeth all chatter, When with cold our hands are blue, We conclude it doesn't matter What the poets say or do. Let them go and catch a frightful Cold that settles in the head; Winter then won't seem so dreadful—Then they'll eat the things they've said.

Prod.

"Think I can't keep a secret, do you?" "Yes, I do," replied her husband. "Well, I've from an old friend rumored over again for the past two months, and I haven't told a soul yet, so there."

A Modern Guess.

"Pa, who was the noblest Roman of them all?" "I don't know. Some fellow with the largest banana push cart I guess."

A Free Ride.

The world goes on through space, I guess, Some miles a second, more or less. But here's the wonder of the trip At such a merry, breakneck clip, That some great trust with lordly airs Is not around collecting fares.

Too Bad.

"Does your furnace keep you warm this weather?" "No; we are so cold that we are hot about it all the time."

Thinks Didn't Match.

"I thought he intended to get married." "So did he, but the girl told him he had another thing."

Only Ornamental.

He was an expert on the bars. A heavy hammer he could throw; His punching bag showed ghastly scars. It broke his back to shovel snow.

Had Warning.

"She married a burglar without knowing it." "Strange she didn't suspect when he stole her heart."

Not Fineable Offense.

"Most anything is allowable in war." "Yes, even stealing a march isn't considered bad form."
