

LEAVES A GOOD FERTILIZER

A great deal of fertilizer is lost every year by destroying decaying vegetation...

The greater part of this decaying vegetation is composed of leaves, and we often see great piles of them being burned during fall and spring...

It is natural to suppose that valuable elements are contained in these leaves, as the food of plants and trees taken in through the roots passes through the cells with the sap...

destroyed that its value is greatly diminished.

Nature has made a grand provision in planning to have the leaves fall under trees and shrubs...

In the economy of nature, nothing is lost, and these elements are used over and over again.

The evaporation through the cells of the tree is, of course, very much less during the dormant season...

Another Blow for Monopoly. Saturday Evening Post. If the people had any appreciable influence upon the public administration at Washington...

car was in advance over the dragged pole of the savage. It also means a death-blow to many kinds of monopoly.

There is nothing to be said against the parcels post, except that it would interfere with the monopoly enjoyed by a few companies which pay astounding dividends out of extortion from the public.
