passed the average of foreign yields. The future of this export market for durum seems assured, and as the department officials believe it will grow from year to year, they are encouraging its culture in Eastern Oregon.

Durum wheat is not much used in breadmaking as the flour is yellow in color. Although it can be put through a bleaching process, it does not meet with the demand for milling purposes as do the standard hard wheat varieties, such as bluestem and club.

Durum wheat has not yet attracted any great attention in Eastern Oregon, although in Eastern Washington and Idaho it is grown extensively and with good profit. It is exceedingly hard and produces more to the acre than do the bluestem or club varieties, but there has not as yet been much of it grown in this section owing to the lack of demand in the local market.
