WORTH WHILE.

Last fall a farmer in the Madras country planted his grain with a presser drill. A presser drill operates in such a manner that the seed is deposited in the ground, and a follower moving immediately behind the drill presses the soft earth tight over the seed and leaves a trench about two inches wide and three inches deep, in the bottom of which the tender grain sprouts first appear in their growth.

When the snow fell these trenches were filled with it, and the sweeping winds did not blow the snow out of the trenches. When the cold snap came last March, the tender sprouts were snug and warm beneath their white blankets and were safe from the biting frosts and poison winds, which blighted thousands of acres of young grain on all sides. When the frosts were gone this grain sprang up and looked out of the trenches and grew, and now drinks in the rain drops, and waves eight and ten inches high, with promise of an abundant harvest, while in the fields that were frozen out and had to be reseeded the grain scarcely covers the clods as yet.

Perhaps this is giving too much credit to the trenches, but it is not presuming too much to think that their presence was a great advantage. If the trenches saved the grain or even helped to save it, they were worth while. They were little and only a by-product of the seed drill, but they were the agents of a great economy.

It will be found to be the little facts that will mean much in the farming of this region which requires methods peculiar to itself. It will be the nicety of adaptation of method, variety of seed and time of planting that will develop the highest possibilities of our soil's production, and it will be the little bits of wisdom that will point the successful way. And every grain of wisdom that can be gained along these lines is worth while.

The little things are worth while. The consideration of them marks the line between the products of genius and mediocrity, between success and failure. It is worth while to think.

List your farms with D. W. Barnett, the Culver real estate man. He will sell them for you. a12-4f
