the death of Sir Richard, and promptly by the pride which was known to be leading feature of his character, he determined not to return, until fortune should have bestowed upon him wealth at least equal to the inheritance which he had been striven, in Spain America he had ousted to accumulate that wealth in vain. As a traveler, sailor, he had toiled for fourty years, and had failed. Worn out and penitent, he had returned home to the corner of English earth in which to lay his weary bones. The tale was plausible enough, and in the telling of it he armed at all points. There was no fear that the navigator of the capture of Osprey, the man who had lived in Oregon, and "cut out" cattle on the Carr Plains, would prove lacking in knowledge of riding, seamanship, or Spanish customs. Moreover, he had determined upon a course of action which showed his knowledge of human nature.

The will under which Richard DeLand sought is more valuable for its timber inherited had been made when the tator was in the first hopeful glow to establish his claim to said land before paternity. By its terms Lady DeLand was to receive a life interest of a thousand a year in her husband's property—which was placed in the hands of two trustees until her eldest son or attained the age of twenty-five years. When either of these events should occur, the property was to be realigned, Lady Devine receiving a sum of a dred thousand pounds, the remainder
