 John Isham has moved the windmill from the well at the old residence over to the big well on the bank of Willow Creek. Mr. Isham has had considerable trouble with the gasoline engine which runs the pump at the big well, and the windmill has been moved over in order that it might help supply the necessary power when there is wind enough to run it. Fortunately for those who have wind mills, there are very few days when the wind does not blow for a portion of the time anyway.
 On the walls of the reading room will be found three views of an experiment station at Cheyenne, where the U. S. government is carrying on experiment work with the state of Wyoming in dry farming. At this station they have a pumping plant by which they irrigate small tracts of garden truck, but the rest of their work is in dry farming and they produce great results, as the pictures show. The views were presented to A. M. Drake by Elwood Mead, U. S. government chief of irrigation investigations, on Mr. Drake's recent visit to the irrigation congress at Boise.—Hend Bulletin.

 Frank Loveland is drilling a well at the old Isham home, which he is now renting. He expects to move the drill over to the well which he started on the lot back of the Pioneer office this afternoon, and after drilling out the plug which was put in it, will plug this hole up and fill in with sufficient cement to make it hold, below the flow of water from which the present supply of the town is drawn. This well was never completed, but at a depth of about 140 feet the drill broke into a crevice in the lava underneath, and it has been contended by many that the waste through this hole is responsible for the shortage of water in a number of wells on that side of town.
