Cove Orchard, owned by William Marnach is now connected with the outside telephone, their new line connecting them with the Culver office having just completed. Eight or ten branches along the line between the Agency and Culver are also connected up with the line, and at Culver have connected with the long distance line. The telephone will prove a great convenience to them, and especially to Mr. Marnach who has been considerably handicapped in disposing of his fruit from the orchard because of the lack of quick communication with his markets.

Marnach is hurrying the work on the line well to completion, in order that it may be ready for use by the time plowing begins. The drilling is being done by James Trotter, and he is now working two shifts, the drill running night and day. Good progress is being made, although at times the work proceeds slowly on account of very hard ground, or on account of sand such as was encountered last week, when after a drilling they had not advanced more than an inch or so. In this instance due to a stratum of sand they were which seemed to run in and fill up as rapidly as they could take it
