TENORS WHILE YOU WAIT.

Industry That Has Thriven Since Jean De Resake Gave It a Start, The corner stone of opera is the tenor, and tenors are scarcer than foureaf clovers Comic operas are now written with baritone heroes for that reason, the Brooklyn Eagle says, but been dreamed of, and tenors must be had to sing in them; else no opera. Hence a tenor voice is a surer and often a larger source of income than a gold mine. Opera managers go up and down the world listening to cabmen, truck drivers, old clo' venders and the singers of popular songs in the cheap resorts, in the hope of hearing a voice that can be developed into an operatic tenor. For heretofore tenors, like the poets, have been born and not made. The manager's best chance was to find such a voice before his rivals and pay for its education. But Jean De Reszke changed all that. He sang for years as a not es-rope. He was a good enough artist, but nobody thought of calling him great. Then a Paris teacher, adding two or three notes to the top of his voice, in a few months transformed De Reszke from a singer at $2,500 a month to one drawing $2,500 a night. Since his transformation the musical world has dreamed of raising baritones into tenors as the alchemists dreamed of transmuting lead to gold. And now a New York teacher has done the trick. Rudolf Berger, who has long been one of the baritones of the solved. Probably it cannot, more than |-The Delineator once or twice in a generation, but that will not prevent a lot of ambitious teachers from trying it.
