WORKING FOR THE WEST

Oregonian

"The Government should do everything in its power to develop every acre of ground within its own domain," says Senator Borah, in a defiant protest against the policy of the faddists of the Pinchot school. Senator Borah has pledged himself to support a measure that will regulate the forestry service, so that there will be less so-called conservation of the forests and more real benefit to the settler. "Out of the reform which Senator Borah suggests, he hopes to secure the adoption of a policy by which every acre of ground within the domain of this country can be developed, and thus prevent the migration of Americans into Canada." Senator Borah, like Secretary Ballinger, is of the West, and he knows the West, its requirements and its possibilities. Theories and fads are not given serious consideration by practical, well-informed men of this type, and it is for that reason that their deductions are seldom faulty.

No one from the West has invited the Eastern faddists to come to the Pacific Northwest and show us how we should conduct our affairs; but Oregon, especially, has been receiving advice and suffering interference in liberal quantities. In the attack on Secretary Ballinger, in the current number of Hampton's Magazine, one John L. Matthews is especially verbose and egotistical in his assumptions of knowledge as to what is needed in Oregon. This self-appointed expert on the needs of Oregon assures us that "if the Deschutes could be developed along the lines I have suggested, the country would fill up with people and the increased passenger and freight traffic would very soon wipe out the extra cost of construction."

For declining to elevate their tracks to a point where all of the value of the water-level grade would be lost, the railroads are accused of being "penny wise and pound foolish," although elsewhere in his article Mr. Matthews states that the "old routes from San Francisco North, circle the base of Mt. Shasta, after a heavy climb in each direction, and make travel and freight hauling slow and costly either way." By the new route through the Deschutes Mr. Matthews admits that it is possible to build a railroad from the Columbia River to San Francisco with a maximum grade of but 1 percent.

Every one at all familiar with the situation and with modern railroad construction knows that "along the lines I (Matthews) have suggested," there would be no railroad up the Deschutes, and without a railroad there would be no development. The Borahs and Ballingers of the West have the confidence of the Western people who are reclaiming this land from the wilderness and the desert. As true Western representatives of the West, they know far better what is needed here than either millionaire faddists of the Pinchot type or yellow muckrakers of the Matthews stripe.

The wonderful possibilities for industrial exploitation in Alaska are reflected in the railroad building now under way in that land of gold and mystery. The first fifty-four miles of the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad, which will be in operation December 1, costs $5,770,000 and the entire road will cost $20,000,000. This road is being built by Eastern capitalists who have made a thorough examination of the field and are perfectly familiar with the resources that will yield the returns on this enormous expenditure. Railroads which cost more than $100,000 per mile in new territory are not very plentiful, even in localities much more thickly settled than Alaska, and the greatness of the undertaking is a high tribute to the territory that possesses natural resources of sufficient quantity and value to warrant such an enterprise. —Oregonian.
