OREGON TRUNK GOING SOUTH

Oregonian

Bids have been called for the grading of the Oregon Trunk Line from Madras to the northern line of the Klamath Indian reservation, and it is expected that the work will be under way by May 1. This announcement is a confirmation of the report printed several weeks ago, that at the time, it was denied by officials of the road. Anyone familiar with the topography of the country traversed by the Oregon Trunk on which work is already in progress, would hardly doubt for a moment that the line was to be pushed south after emerging from the Deschutes canyon and reaching the borders of the great Central Oregon empire. The most expensive part of the line will be completed by the time the southern end of the canyon is reached. It would be strange, indeed, if the road was not continued far enough south to equalize the heavy cost of construction and at the same time supply the road with traffic which could not be reached with a terminus at Madras.

There are many reasons why Portland would like to see the state line the southern terminus of the road. It would then draw all the traffic to this city. But there is no good reason for believing that the Klamath country will be any more of a terminus for the Oregon Trunk than there was for believing that Madras was the final objective point. There are so many excellent reasons why the Hill line should push on to California and so few reasons why it should terminate in Oregon that it may be regarded as a certainty that the road will be pushed through to San Francisco at the earliest possible day. Long before the line reaches the California metropolis, however, it will have opened up a wide area of new trade territory which will be tributary exclusively to Portland.

It will tap vast tracts of fine timber and will build up new cities and towns, all of which to greater or lesser degree will pay tribute to Portland. The Harriman lines, which are also pushing southward with surveys looking to move favorable routes, will also aid in this new development. After years of waiting, one of the richest portions of the state is at last to receive transportation facilities, the lack of which alone prevented growth equal to that in other parts of the state.
