Great Activity at Celilo

The Dalles, Or. November 26.— In view of the great engineering undertakings in progress by both the Oregon Trunk and the Government, Celilo, at present is perhaps the most interesting place in the Northwest.

The village of Celilo, 12 miles east of The Dalles, has been to the railroad world scarcely more than a flag station of the O. R.
 & N. until the Hill railway system decided to span the Columbia by a steel bridge. In the commercial world it had acquired prominence through the fishing operations of I. H. Taffe, which caused him to be named one of the fish kings of the Upper Columbia. Now the postoffice, the schoolhouse, the station and the dwelling-house of Mr. Taffe, which formed the town, with the little brown houses of the Indians who have lived there for so many years, making their living by fishing, are almost lost among the tar paper shanties which have been put up along the river, from Cel-ilo, to a point far below the bridge that is being built, and these tar paper houses are occupied alike by the laborers for Uncle Sam and J. J. Hill.

Celilo has always been one of the most attractive of the many scenic spots along the Columbia, because of the beautiful falls of Celilo and Tumwater, which are just below the village, and, indeed, if it were not for these obstructions in the river there would be no need for the Government to expend many millions of dollars and many years of labor in the construction of the canal, and James J. Hill, in building his Oregon Trunk line to connect with the North Bank road would find it impossible to bridge the river there were it not for the facilities offered for the planting of the piers and abutments on the boulders and islands obstructing the river, for they will all be placed on the solid rock underpinning of nature.

To appreciate the grandeur and beauty of the falls of Celilo they must be seen. The whole width of the river from the falls to the opposite bank is broken by rapids, in fact, on down until the Dalles of the Columbia and Big Eddy are passed the river is so broken and obstructed as to present nothing but rapids and whirlpools, islands and rocks.
 The incessant roar of Celilo Falls partially drowns the noise of blasting, the crushing rock and the engines that are moving all the machinery employed in the construction work, and for an instant, the vastness of these undertakings by man is forgotten.
 The Tumwater Falls are distinct in every way from the Falls of Celilo. They are several rods down the river from the big falls and are, seemingly, water spilling out of an immense basin of rocks where nicks have been broken in the rim.

Just below these falls is seen the wooden trestle framework of the Oregon Trunk bridge with the tramways and cars for the hauling of materials for building the piers on this side. The tres-tlework here is only a few rods in length, but from the opposite bank it extends nearly across on the rocks. This bridge is the terminal of the Oregon Trunk, and Porter Bros., who have constructed toe line up the Deschutes River into Central Oregon and whose offices the past year and a half have been in The Dalles, have the contract for its building. The contract for the steel work of the bridge has been awarded, but the names not made public.

The false trestlework is built out to the channel of the river from the north bank, and at the end a huge derrick is stationed which lifts the huge tramcars, filled with the concrete mixture from the track, swinging them around and dumping into the wooden forms for the piers.
 The south trestle is very much shorter, stopping before it reaches the canal, but a huge derrick here is performing the same service that it does on the north side. Hundreds and hundreds of tons of cement are being used in the construction of these piers, and rock crushers are at work all the time preparing rock for use in the work. It is expected that the bridge will be ready for use in a year and a half from now.
