Clear Profit.
Dan Fishell, manager of the Princess theater, tells of an incident that happened when he was in charge of the Garrick. He says it was during a run of a popular play and a little man down in the front row would jump up every little while and stutter:

"Gee, b-b-but t-t-that's g-g-great."
An usher warned him several times without avail until Fishell and the audience grew tired of the interruption. Fishell finally went to the box office, obtained $1.50 and took it down to the little man in the aisle, who at that moment was bubbling over with enthusiasm.

"Here," said Fishell, presenting him with the admission money—"here is the price of your ticket. Now you'll have to get out."

"D-d-d-do I have t-t-t-to g-g-g-go?" asked the man.

"You certainly do," replied Fishell grimly.

"Well, it's j-j-j-just as well," replied the man as they reached the door. "You s-s-see, I c-c-c-came in on a p-p-p-pass."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The Combination.
Old Daniel Drew was at his house on Union square, New York, one day when his clerks sent up for the combination of the safe which they wanted to open. Drew said it was "door."

They sent again, saying it was a five letter combination and they couldn't make "door" go. Finally Drew went down. "When I took the thing in hand," he said, "the safe opened as easy as anything. I turned to them. 'There,' says I, 'it opens as easy as an old sock. Just d-o-o-r-e.'"
