SUNDAY EPISODES

There is no gainsaying the fact that this country is full of surprises, nor are all the surprises handed out to the stranger, either. This time of year, more specially during the duck hunting season, the busy scenes that are evident on the streets every day, are transferred to the bay Sundays. Everybody seemed to be out for ducks Sunday, and what were not killed outright were scared to death.

Max Timmerman is trying to redeem himself as a hunter. He and his party worked hard all day from 5 a. m. with net results of four ducks. At that rate it will take him 14 years to ever pass a civil service examination as a hunter.

Charley McCulloch and his party had their boat loaded with rabbit feet and horseshoes, they got 44.

H. S. Tower, Tom Hall and others in the same party bagged a half dozen. They forgot to send in their excuses, but it is known they were all over Kentuck and Haines Inlets.

Mr. Beary and his friend got tired of trying for ducks and killed four mudhens. After much perseverance they finally got two butter ducks and well blistered hands.

Jim and Jack Ellerby stuck to their old side lines—crabs and clams. Their headquarters on the lower bay is at the old cannery across from Empire. On their way down they left their dinner in the house until they came back. Somebody beat them to it and when Jim got his coffee made all he could find was about a spoonful of jelly. Jack said he was glad they left that much, otherwise they would not have been positive that they brought anything along to eat.

But Messrs. Mitchell and Jones, of the Fixup, played the star engagement of the day. They were up North Inlet with their families and got stuck on the flats. Mitchell jumped into his "waders" and got to the sand hills. After much skirmishing he got enough planks to make a pantoon so that the ladies could get ashore, a large bonfire was built and there some time was put in getting their boat into the channel. That was accomplished and then the engine bucked on them. Yes, it bucked many times. But with paddles and cuss words perseverance and more cuss words they finally landed in Marshfield about 3 a. m. Mitchell says he landed on the wharf all right and turned to help the rest out. Jones says he made it in two jumps. At any event Mitchell wound up the day's events by giving a correct imitation of a man going overboard with all his clothes on. The boys say it makes a nice story to tell their friends, but are not particular about practicing up in order to make their stories too real.

—Masquerade Ball, at Summer, November 23. Good music.

LANE MAN WANDERS AWAY IN DELIRIUM

Andrew King Came to Eugene, to Brother's Funeral, and Vanished.

Eugene, Ore., Nov. 18.—Andrew King, a resident of the Upper McKenzie valley, has disappeared, and his people are much worried lest he has met with some accident or has lost his mind and has wandered away. He arrived in Eugene Thursday afternoon to attend the funeral of his brother, Charles King, who was killed the day before at Marcola. He put up his team in a neighbor's barn and has not been seen since. He was complaining of being ill when he arrived and had a high fever. It is thought he might have become delirious and wandered away, or that he might have gone to a lodging house, and being unable to attend the funeral, stayed there, but a diligent search fails to reveal his whereabouts. The missing man is about 45 years old.

IMPROVED ORDER REDMEN

By J. H. Fitzgerald, Great Senior Sagamore.

Our order is a brotherhood of individuals whose personal characteristics are not sacrificed, but whose common interests are maintained and strengthened as the members harmonize around our council fires.

We are proud of it for its past; we love it for what it is to us, and we hope much for its future. As the American citizen feels the patriotic blood tingle in his veins while reading the early pages of his country's history, so our hearts throb as we remember that the Societies of Tamnia and of Red Men were a part of that history; and every true Improved Red Man feels an added dignity and sense of responsibility because it is so.

The aggregate judgment of erring man cannot assume the character of divinity, nor any human organization devised for any purpose arrogate to itself a monopoly of character or kindly qualities. It is the silent force of right living—the potent agency of good deeds—that entitles our order to be hailed as the handmaid of religion, the promoter of true citizenship, the herald of a purer civilization. It has not established a religion, but has fitted men to perform those acts of charity that make the crowning grace of all religions. It has not created a code of morals, yet teaches us to observe those sound principles of life and conduct that constitute the soul of all morality. It has not formulated a creed, yet no one can be a true Red Man unless he has faith in the Great Spirit, which implies and necessitates faith in man. It has not given to the world a new standard of loyalty, but it teaches that fidelity to country and established law which elevates and ennoble the character of the citizen and insures the safety of the state.

It has touched the hearts of men of divers forms of creed and melted them into one. It has brought warring factions into the fold of fellowship and created a mighty union of love that has overleaped the barriers of the natural world and destroyed the artificial destructions of society.

The work done by our order, as well as the ideals upon which its work is based, is to be of service to us all in the struggle of self-realization. We believe that it does much towards the development of intellectual life. We look over the great monuments of all the departments of the world's life and thought and action, and we study them with reference to their final effect upon the character of the people.

There is not a railroad that has been built; there is not an industry that is established; there is not a mill wheel that is set in motion; there is nothing in secular or business life that is undertaken that does not have its final effect upon the shaping, the developing and the moulding of the moral character of the community. Everything that goes on in the business world—all great enterprises and such institutions as orphan asylums, homes for the aged and infirm, have done more and are doing more for the development of the moral side of the community than all the creeds and catechisms and ceremonies of those who believe that such things constitute the fundamental principles of a church or temple.
