INUENDOES

Dr. Straw has been mayor of Marshfield for two years. He is now a candidate for reelection. When an man who has occupied public office comes before his constituency to be turned, members of that constituency invariably ask questions about what he has done in his expired term. Does Dr. Straw object to this? Does he feel that he is attacked when he is asked a question? Is it proper politics for the opposition to propound these questions? "What has been your system of bookkeeping?" Is that a question or an innuendo? "Why did you never have the ordinances published?" "Why did you not dismiss that police officer who, according to Judge Upton, in the Smith case, was guilty of insubordination and brutality in his attack on Smith?" "Explain why the streets which you intended to put in good condition are in such bad condition?" How was the money expended? How about the city hall (?) lots and the warrant drawn to pay for them? "Why do all these questions make the doctor mad?" "Why does he call them innuendoes?" What is an innuendo? Has the doctor had any experience in politics? "Did he ever have any experience in municipal government before?" "If he had ever held office before and had asked to be re-elected on his record would he have answered questions by declaring that such questions were innuendoes?" Would he not have recognized the right of the people to ask questions and then have undertaken to answer them? "It has been understood before this that the doctor supposed that during his administration the city government of Marshfield existed principally in his vest pocket and that the people were not to know what he was about to do, but only what he had done. Does the doctor really think that he is insulted when questions are asked and does he not know that it is the mission and duty of the opposition to ask questions especially when statements are never made by the city officers?"
