PLEADS FOR PROHIBITION

Rev. F. W. Jones Speaks to Large Audience on "Home vs. Saloon."

An audience that filled the Baptist church last night greeted Rev. F. Jones of Philomath, Ore., who addressed the people of Marshfield on the theme "Home vs. the Saloon." His address was an argument for absolute prohibition, a plea for the voters of Coos county to vote "dry" at the local option election, June 2d, and was frequently applauded by the audience.

After using a Bible illustration to show how God always aids righteousness, even though the battle may be against odds, to victory, Mr. Jones took up the moral and monetary phases of the liquor question, speaking in part as follows:

"We are all agreed, I believe, that the moral side of the liquor question is with prohibition. I have never heard that challenged, the opponents of prohibition, nearly always confining their arguments to the money side of it. They claim that prohibition kills towns and communities but these allegations are untrue; on the contrary, I will cite you instances right here in Oregon where towns and counties have been benefited by prohibition.

"Take Corvallis, for instance. When the local option was submitted there, the usual cry went up that prohibition would kill the town and community. The untrue appeal was in vain and Corvallis and the county went dry. The next spring, $175,000 was invested in residences and other improvements in Corvallis that never would have gone there had it remained wet--the investors being people who wanted to move to a city to educate their children, but who were determined not to move to a place where their children would be endangered by the demon rum. Corvallis is making more rapid progress now than ever before. The superintendent of the public schools told me recently that four teachers had to be added to the staff in order to take care of the increased enrollment and that the growth in population would soon necessitate additional school buildings. The city is being improved, large sums are being spent on the roads and taxes are lower than when they had to defray the expense of criminal cases arising from liquor.

"The same has been true of the five counties around Benton that are now dry. All are prospering under prohibition to a greater extent than they did under the liquor regime. Taxes are lower, more and better improvements are being made and there is peace and prosperity. There is little or no crime. In Benton county we have had but one criminal case in the four years of prohibition, aside from the prosecution necessary to prevent the operation of blind pigs and bootlegging. The one criminal case in those four years was that of a poor fellow who was charged by liquor brought to him from Albany.

"Don't compromise in this great fight. The regulated saloon that the liquor men plead for when they recognize they are being defeated by the mighty hosts of righteousness is a farce. The thing to do is to separate liquor from man entirely--if you don't, there is trouble. The only way to do this by absolute prohibition. The other day, the Mayor of Myrtle Point came around to me and outlined what he thought would be the right kind of a saloon, saying that if there aren't saloons there will be blind pigs. His plea was wrong and I am right here to say the blind pigs can be driven out if the people and the officials are alert and ready to do their work. One trouble with the regulated saloon is that the liquor business breeds lawlessness. I have never seen or heard of a saloon man who didn't constantly violate the laws under which he was supposed to be operating.

"I am glad that Marshfield has closed its saloons at nights and on Sundays and now I am confident that the people of Coos county will do the right thing and vote June 2d, to close them all the time."
