ANCESTOR WORSHIPERS.

There is one man who has drawn a little apart from the common crowd which prostrates itself before the images of its aristocratic, powder-and-puff, star-and-garter ancestors of putative kinsmanship. This man has a forbear, too, of whom he is proud and willing to boast, perhaps, at times; which is right. He differs from the others, not in the pardonable satisfaction he takes in admiring his progenitor, but in the ancestral qualities which he admires. When one boasting asserts that his great grand uncle dusted out the bed chamber of the king of England, this anomalous ancestor worshiper retorts quietly: "My father used a pick and a sluicing cradle before he learned how to use a table fork; he was a gold miner before he was anything else." This strange man is Clarence H. Mackay of Nevada. A few days ago he presented to the University of Nevada a statue of his father—the Nevada Mackay who started a great fortune by manual labor.

Now, ninety-nine men in every hundred would have had his parent's likeness completed with a frock coat, silk hat and distinguished looking waistcoat. Mr. Mackay is the hundredth man. Frock coats and silk hose were superficial features of his father's life, and came only during later years. His first costume of maturity consisted of a pair of cowhide boots, a red flannel shirt, a slouch hat and corduroys. Mr. Mackay prefers to think of his father as the sturdy, fearless, tenacious youth who braved the hardships of the camps and won a fortune by the labor of his own hand. He entertained an affection for the aristocratic capitalist; but it is of the miner he is most proud. Consequently, he has caused the new statue of the elder Mackay to be carved in an untrammelled attitude. The figure is booted, the shirt open at the front. Just a common pick is clenched in one hand. This is the real Mackay and any other representation would have been a falsehood.

Perhaps Mr. Mackay has a nobleman or so in his lineage somewhere; but he has not mentioned the fact, doubtless never having deemed it of sufficient importance for words. To him the true nobility is the nobility of toil and strife and achievement. That rugged statue on the university campus means more to Mr. Mackay, and it means more to the state of Nevada, than could the busts of an entire succession of hereditary kings of reputed relationship.

AMERICAN HARDWOODS.

The rapid consumption of American hardwoods is causing the timber dealers of the United States to turn their attention to the supplies of adjoining countries. The mesquite of Texas is beginning to find favor, several carloads having recently been shipped from that State to Michigan, where the wood is manufactured into furniture. Mexico has a pretty fair supply of this class of timber and our manufacturers would like to break in upon it, but there is a stiff export duty imposed by Mexico on unmanufactured timber which stands in the way of their desires, and is not likely to be removed, for the Mexicans in imposing it were inspired by the double purpose of conserving their timber supply and of encouraging domestic manufactures. No obstacles are planned in the way of its use by manufacturers in Mexico, but mesquite is not likely to go out of the republic in its raw state while the Mexicans are in their present frame of mind. —San Francisco Chronicle.
