THE DREDGE.

No matter how pronounced may be the success of able men they are not necessarily foreseeing or even astute beyond the limits of their specialty. Why the men who are deeply interested in Coos Bay do not more earnestly push their own fortunes and make their enterprises more prosperous, by organizing the bay as a business proposition cannot be understood. The position of the citizens on the question of getting the dredge from Portland, which was constructed for this harbor is a case in point. The dredge was available provided the funds to operate it were available, but by reason of the failure of Congressman Hawley to appreciate the fact that this Bay is worthy his congressional consideration, the Bay did not get a little matter of $25,000 which was due it from the government. If the port of Coos Bay were in existence, or if the consolidated city of Coos Bay were incorporated, such an emergency would be very easily met. The property of the entire district could then be taxed to provide funds to operate the dredge. True, the processes of taxation could not be set in motion in season to satisfy Col. Roessler that the dredge could be sent here, but it would be an easy matter for citizens to pledge the amount necessary with the understanding that they could be reimbursed by the port of the consolidated city. Such methods have very frequently been resorted to and there is nothing in Oregon's law to prevent port or city charters from providing for just such cases. This brings us to consider whether the "large interests" which dominate Coos Bay are really anxious to create a large market place here? Do they want their properties to increase in value and their shipping to find easy and safe access to the Coos waterways? Are they really of opinion that consolidation and port organizations which will make all property fear its just proportion of the expense of improving the Bay, is a political rather than a purely business undertaking? Yet, when consolidation was discussed last year, they extended no favor to it, and if they are now asked to take care of their own interests and do what the consolidated city or port would have done, they have no cause to complain. Coos Bay should be under one control and that should be one public corporation. What will be done? If the shipping, financial and real estate interests of Coos Bay would advance money to dredge the bay, no doubt a sufficiently safe compact could be entered into whereby to insure the issuance of bonds by a port or consolidated city, to repay such advances. It would, of course, not be legal until the legislature had met, had passed a general law by which ports may be organized, until the port had been organized under such law and the bonds had been issued to take up and pay the debts incurred, to those special interests. Even this could not be done except authority so to do were conferred by the law permitting ports to be organized. We understand that the Chamber of Commerce of Marshfield and North Bend have a joint committee which has the matter of the creation of a port in charge and it may not be amiss to remind that joint committee that now is a good time to get busy and prepare for the next session of the legislature. It is none too soon, and very likely the attorney appointed by that committee would need to have the support of his committee in employing his time in preparing a general law for the organization of ports in Oregon and especially with a view to the conditions at Coos Bay. It will save the people many $25,000 contributions if they pay an attorney a few hundred dollars to prepare an acceptable port law.
