COOS BAY COALING STATION.

The arrival of three torpedo boats which are parts of the United States Navy and the action of such boats in coaling up at this port may not in itself seem to be an event of vast importance. But it is, nevertheless, the first time in the history of Coos Bay that its native coals have been used for naval purposes and the first time that naval boats, except light ships, have ever entered the port and taken on such native coals for steam purposes. The meaning of this may seem of little consequence even to the officer in charge of the boats, but the fact is that it marks the beginning of an era the importance of which cannot be minimized. There is no coal on the Pacific coast of North and South America south of Puget Sound except at Coos Bay and the surrounding country. The growth of the commerce of the Pacific, the vast increase of her future shipping, the assembling of great population on these western shores, will force the maintenance of a naval power in the great ocean which washes these shores. There must be a naval station and coaling station and the most suitable place for such station is where the coal is produced. On the Pacific, the only port where coal can be furnished from mines within three or four miles of the wharf is Coos Bay. It is probable that no other port in the world can furnish coal to the ship at the mine's mouth. Here, then, are the possibilities which are equalled nowhere on earth. Boundless timber! Inexhaustible coal! A bay capable of being converted into a capacious deep sea harbor at one half the cost of Long Beach's breakwater, one fourth the cost of Boston's thirty-five foot channel, one tenth the cost of reducing the Columbia river bar. In return Coos Bay can furnish the government a coal which will be equal to that which keeps the German navy afloat.

The coals which the torpedo boats are taking on are not up to the naval standard, but the tests lately made by W. A. Thies, M. E., a German expert who has solved the problem of briquetting Coos Bay coals, and who is high authority on the subject, have proven that Coos Bay coals can be brought up to the naval standard by briquetting. The Times is able to say that parties are proposing to install a plant for such briquetting work and that the prospects are very satisfactory for such a plant within the next six months. The company proposes to obtain its machinery from Magdeburg, Prussia. Mr. Thies having advised that as being readily adaptable to the work here. Mr. Thies states on the highest German and French authority that the following reasons exist for the use of briquets rather than raw coal on naval vessels; first, they make no smoke and the streak of black smoke left by the use of bituminous coal, by which the enemy knows the position of the vessels, is avoided; second, the briquets are more easily fired and reduce boiler room forces; third, they evaporate more water for the same grate area and thus allow a greater power output from a given furnace and boiler; fourth, they require less store room; fifth, there is no waste; sixth, the fires fed by the briquets may be kept up for a long period without cleaning; seventh, steam pressure is more uniform; eighth, there is no liability of spontaneous combustion; ninth, insurance rates are therefore diminished; tenth, there is less sweeping of tubes required. The existence of at least four hundred square miles of coal land in the Coos and Curry county coal fields—most of whose product is capable of being briquetted without a binder or the introduction of any ingredient to bind the culm—is a far better insurance of future great harbor improvements than anything else. The coaling at this point of the torpedo boats will be followed sooner or later by fleets and great ships of war.
