THE REAL LABOR VOTE.

While the Republican party was brought into being by the tolling masses and has achieved all its successes through their unflinching support, it has vigorously opposed every attempt to require American wage earners to vote collectively, either in obedience to political bosses or as directed by self styled "labor leaders" who sometimes lead, but rarely labor.

The Democratic party, however, has sedulously sought and is still seeking to establish an antagonism of interest between grades of labor whose interests are identical. It would have the worker in the mill believe that the mill owner is his enemy. It would have employer and employee constantly at war, though each knows that neither can prosper unless both are content.

Whenever or whenever a difference arises between one group of laborers, who may be the immediate producers of a given community, and another group, charged with the equally important task of finding markets and consumers for the product, the Democratic party uses the event as the pretext for a further appeal to the spirit of prejudice and passion, always attempting to excite hostility between employer and employee.

In all such cases the principle and practice of the Republican party are exactly the reverse. It holds that controversies between employer and employee are almost invariably due to a misunderstanding of their mutual interests and that a frank appeal to the reason and fair mindedness of those concerned is all that is needed to effect an agreement honorable to both sides.

The Democratic party rejoices in discord among the makers of national greatness. It fattens on public misfortune. It finds in every misunderstanding between employer and employee an excuse for the sinister hint that those who are in the market to buy labor are the natural enemies of those who have labor to sell.

On the other hand, the Republican party recognizes any serious disagreement between the sellers and the buyers of labor—between the employee and the employer—as a matter of grave concern to the general welfare, requiring careful nonpartisan scrutiny and wise legislation to protect the common interests of the people. The Republican party has never rejoiced in hard times. It has never applauded a panic or an era of business depression. It is the party of prosperity, not of calamity. It is strongest when the people are happiest. It glories in their successes, grieves for their misfortunes and disdains to seek political advantages in public disaster.

The real "labor vote" in this country is the American people. They make and mar the destinies of parties and candidates. Nothing is so hateful to them as the assumption that they can be delivered like sheep in the shambles to any nominee of any party. This year's campaign is a frank appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the American "labor vote," and the party which gave three martyrs—Lincoln, Garfield and McKinley—to the cause of the common people will accept the November verdict as one of those judgments which are "true and righteous altogether."

Now is the time to get busy in The Times' Prize Contest.

WITH THE TOAST AND TEA

GOOD EVENING.

Aspiration sees only one side of every question; possession many.

LOWELL

The Ballad of Now.

Sing not to me of other days, Of times agone or times to be. The Past has burned in curling haze, The Future is an ungrown tree, A peach or lemon—we shall see. But stark and bare is last year's bough,

Bank not on either—as for me I sing the cheering song of Now.

Give Hope and Memory a rest, Too long you've had them at your beck;

There are no birds in last year's nest. You pay no bills with last year's check.

Your hopes may get it in the neck, Your rainbow's end rest in a slough,

Let others celebrate Hope's wreck, I sing the cheering song of Now.

Let Memory smooth the furrowed brow

Of him who's made his little pile; Let Hope sit on the drifting prow

Of him who'll make it "after while;"

Let Memory's dream and Hope's sly smile

With brightest glamour them endow;

Let Past and Future them beguile— I sing the cheering song of Now.

MARCO MORROW.

It is getting so that a man can't rest secure in the possession of his rainy day fund so long as anything is left in either him or his wife that the doctors can cut out.

Sometimes I think the real test of a thoroughbred and that means the highest test of manliness or womanliness, consists in paying the price for what you have had without a murmur.

Children act very badly sometimes, but parents never dream of having them sent to insane asylums. Cases are reported every day of children having their parents caged up for acting foolish.

Woman suffragists at a convention discussed the problem of what they could do with the ballot. In the primary election out here in Oregon, they could have covered the pantry shelves and had several yards left.

Most men who die prematurely die either of stomach or kidney trouble, the result of overeating and overdrinking. Women live longer than men; half the women "diet." If the men don't do more of it, there will not be enough men left after a while to hold an election.

ROSEBURG OPTIMISTIC.

At least the Development Congress demonstrated to many people that Roseburg and Coos Bay are on the map and that a railroad or electric road will be built between these points in the near future. The interests of all Southern Oregon demand that this be done.—Roseburg Review.
