THE PROMOTION OF PEACE TEACHING

TIME WAS, and not so very long ago, when school children were led by their teachers and text-books, sometimes intentionally, sometimes unintentionally, to take sides in the rivalries of nations. In other words, the prejudices, racial and otherwise, that dominated their later lives were permitted to take root in the school room. The result was that men and women of one country—it matters not which one—were very prone to regard the men and women of other countries, in the widest possible sense of the term, as aliens, and too often as natural enemies.

A Boston woman teacher, the HAINES.

product of a later period and a higher civilization, Mrs. Fannie Fern Andrews, has just been addressing the Southern Educational Association, in convention at Charlotte, N. C., in a strain that leaves no room for doubt as to the progress that the education of children has made and is making in another direction, says the Christian Science Monitor. Southern educators have long been in a mood of receptivity with relation to the teachings of peace. Instruction in the virtue and the practicability of peaceful methods has perhaps gone farther in the South than in the north. Mrs. Andrews, therefore, had the privilege of speaking to a sympathetic audience, and she seems to have made the most of her opportunity.

At all events, she brought out very clearly the point that the people of the world today are interdependent. The pupil, she said, should be taught that the resources of all countries are necessary to supply the wants of humanity—that every active man, wherever he may be, makes some contribution to the well-being of the world at large. Our national life in all its phases is closely interwoven with the life of other countries, especially in this age of growing international friendship. "Our teachers," she said, "must point out the special mission of the United States, the grandest experiment in the development of democracy in the movement for the completion of the great union of the nations."

Almost every one of the elementary school studies can be made to serve in this particular a good purpose. Of late years internationalism has taken on a new meaning. The universal brotherhood of man is coming into universal recognition, not merely as a sentiment, but as one of the most potent facts in human experience. The fruit of this recognition will be gathered all the sooner if the school children of all lands be taught to believe in it and to work toward it.
