WHY NOT A FLY CATCHER?

IN THESE DAYS of intense competition the development of a new activity, however limited, is glad news to the struggling army of breadwinners.

The recent announcement from New York that a man can earn a comfortable living as a professional rat catcher is said to have started a number of men in different parts of the country studying the requirements of the profession, says an exchange.

If Mr. Frey, the rodent exterminator aforesaid, can prosper at his calling and have time to study Epictetus why isn't there room for a professional fly catcher?

Mr. Frey declares he chose rat catching because in his studies at the University of Zurich he learned that a small supply and a large demand meant a good income.

But comparing flies with rats there would seem to be even a greater number of the former, and as yet no professional exterminator in the field at all. Rats carry the bubonic plague, but flies, experts say, are living cultures of typhoid germs. To have the bedpost gnawed off in the night is annoying, but to be awakened about 5 a. m. by one of these brassy, bumptious, sportive, blue-bottle houseflies, buzz-buzzing about your nose, sailing away to the ceiling and buzz-buzzing back again, is infinitely more wearing on the nerves and disposition.

It is offered simply as a suggestion, but there would seem to be a lucrative and serviceable profession here for some man with a quick eye and a nimble wrist. Incidentally he could work in the north in the summer and spend his winters with profit in Texas or Mexico.

When a woman is called to the telephone, her end of the conversation is a bunch of exclamation points. "Is that so?" she will say. "How perfectly terrible. How will you ever endure it! I never heard of anything so terrible!" Before she has dropped the receiver, every member of her family has put on hat and coat to run to the scene to prevent murder, put out a fire, cut down a would-be suicide, or do something like that, and, when she turns around, it is to relate with an expression as excited as her voice, that the woman with whom she has just been talking got down too late to secure a bargain!

EASTSIDE IS A WINNER.
