GLIMPSES OF CHINA
Studies in the Life and Character of Its People and Little Known Facts About the Country.
Written for The Coos Bay Times.

China, a land remarkable for its extent and its resources, is perhaps still more remarkable on account of the people that inhabit it. We are too often inclined to get our estimate of the Chinese as a people from what we see of them in this country. It is almost unnecessary to say that of the quarter of a million of Chinese in this land only a very small percentage are really representative of the Chinese found on their own soil. Practically all of the working class of Chinese in this land come from Canton or its vicinity. The Cantonese are the migratory class of China, and do not truly represent the Chinese people as a whole.

The foreigner on going to China finds that his opinion formed of the Chinese from those seen in this land has to undergo a radical readjustment. There he is brought in contact with a people, many of whom are cultured and refined, and few of whom have not a native instinct for politeness and affability. Nor does this apply, as some might think, simply to the educated, scholarly class. It applies as well to the business man, the official class and the day laborer. The Chinese take life more easily than we do. No pursuit is allowed to become such an absorbing passion with them that they must dispense with the common laws of courtesy and kindness. The ideal gentleman or gentle woman held up before them in their class is one who has been trained in the civilities and the courtesies of life, one who moves along leisurely with plenty of time to be gentle and hospitable and gracious in demeanor. He sees there a people who are naturally gentle and unobtrusive. He soon finds that, instead of having to carry firearms to protect himself (as most foreigners at home think it is necessary to do) he is really safer than on his own soil in many instances. He has no fear in going anywhere so long as he attends to his own affairs. With the exception of some sections in the extreme western part of the country, where the people have not been brought in contact with civilization or come to know the foreigner sufficiently well, it is quite safe, even for a woman, to travel from one end of the country to the other. Many women missionaries go off on long trips alone into isolated sections of the country, and they tell us that they have nothing to fear. They would not be half so safe in taking similar journeys in this land.

All these facts force upon us the conclusion that our over-exaggeration of things Western and our pride in the achievements of Western people, often blind us to the good qualities in our brethren across the waters. Our Oriental friends, and not the least among them the Chinese, have some things which we may with profit take home to ourselves. If the West can boast of her higher civilization in pointing other peoples on the pathway to progress and enlightenment, yet there are some things which we need an Oriental Gamaliel to teach us.

The characteristics of the Chinese which we would do well to study are: their love of peace and high regard for law; the absence of all class distinctions and the prevalence of a democratic spirit; respect for superiors, whether in age, position or intellect; domination by the historic instinct to such an extent that the past is not only revered but is a wholesome check upon unwarranted innovations; a native suavity, gentleness and courtesy; and lastly, infinite patience.

In origin, the Chinese people are not of yesterday. From the dim far-off past they have come down to this day with a history remarkable for its length and its smoothness. Migrating from Central Asia, a small tribe like the tribes of Israel, they settled on the banks of the Yellow river, and in extending their boundaries southward, they came in contact with the aborigines whom they drove out. There is no means of knowing just when they left their home in Asia, except that it occurred sometime between 3,000 and 2,300 years before the Christian era. They evidently came to stay, for they have been a permanent fixture in the land to this day. With more than four thousand years of history behind them, yet there apparently has come to them no diminution of strength, no abatement of natural vigor. Where, we might ask, is there a people which can boast of so ancient a lineage? Long before the Christian era they developed a comparatively high civilization of their own, and while they may not have added much to this progress, yet they have at least brought it along with them out of the past with but slight impairment. The Egyptian, the Babylonian, the Assyrian, the Greek, the Roman have each developed their own civilization, only to pass away to make room for another. They are all mere names on the pages of history. But the Chinese is still with us, altho' his civilization ante-dates some of those we have mentioned. They are made venerable by age, if nothing else. There is a saying that we should respect the young because they have a long way to travel, and also the old.

because they have already travelled a long way. One feels thus regarding the Chinese. They carry us through the longest continuous stretch of authentic history of any race of people who have ever lived. Even Christianity seems to them a new thing compared with the early beginnings of their race. I felt this whenever I passed through their walled cities, the foundations of many of which were laid hundreds of years before Christ was born. One feels himself in the spirit of Napoleon's words to his troops before the pyramids. "In truth, forty centuries are looking down upon us."

The genius of Chinese civilization is shown in that it has developed the people along intelligent and practical lines, and yet, that civilization has not been entirely devoid of inventive talent. Some evidence of it has come to the western world in discoveries and inventions which bear an unmistakable mark of Chinese origin.

The honor for the discovery of gun powder is contested by English, German, Arab and Hindu, but we pass over the ones to whom the credit is really due, to the Chinese. They were the first experimenters in the field of alchemy, and as the ingredients for gunpowder require no fixed proportion, it was inevitable that the happy accident should have occurred among them first. Nor is the evidence for this discovery wanting. As early as 767 A. D. there is mention made of the use of cannons capable of throwing stones and also mention of the use of mines. Another authority relates that in 1131 A. D. a practical fleet on the river Yangtze was destroyed by a "thunder bomb," secretly sent among the ships.

Again, China's claim to the discovery of the Mariner's compass is uncontested. The magnet was not unknown at an early epoch to both Greeks and Egyptians, but it was the Chinese who first discovered its directive properties. The popularity of the needle was used by them long before the Christian era. There is an unvarying statement among them that magnetic needles were given to ambassadors from a southern country to enable them to find their way home, 1100 B. C. The same needle was used at sea in coasting vessels as early as the fifth century A. D.

It is thought that Gutenberg's invention of printing was prompted by the knowledge that something similar existed in the Flowery Kingdom. For seven hundred years the art had been practiced there, not in secret, as he and Faustus practiced it, but as a popular industry. The origin of Chinese printing came about in a remarkable way. A tyrant, in an endeavor to uproot the principles of Confucius had all his writings destroyed. They were restored, however partly from memory and partly from imperfect copies found in the walls of an old house. In the year 627 A. D. the Emperor Tai Tsung, to guard against a similar occurrence, had all the writings of the great Sage engraved on slabs of stone. One hundred and seventy of these slabs, bearing on their faces the text of the thirteen classics, are still extant. Later on the idea arose of having rubbings made from these slabs so as to make them accessible to Chinese scholars. Here was the idea of printing in embryo.

Other discoveries, scarcely less important, are to be credited to the Chinese; for example, the art of porcelain making, the manufacture of silk, and discoveries in the sciences of astronomy, mathematics and physics. It is supposed that the substance of ether was known to the Chinese a thousand years ago.

One thing is to be noted in all the discoveries and inventions of the Chinese. They need to be transplanted to other soil in order to attain their highest development, most likely because of the intense conservatism of the Chinese, their willingness to rest upon the laurels of their ancestors and to go no further. Still, if the beginning was theirs, it places upon them, as a people, no inferior mark in the scale of civilization and enlightenment, and that at a time when western peoples had made little or no advance along the lines of progress.
