AMBISH.

I'm anxious to quit all this verse-writing stuff that is laid out in stanzas correct; for though it is good it's not paying enough, and it never will pay, I expect. What I'm anxious to do is this syndicate dope, which swifly and easily flows; to write like Walt Mason does, some day, I hope—the verse that pretends to be prose. I'm tired of selling the work of my brain for 10 cents, or less, by the line; for I'd be a poet who drinks his champagne, and goes where the wealthy folks dine. I want to be sold to the countryside press at a price that will banish my woes; and this sort of feature will do it, I guess—the verse that pretends to be prose.
