

UNCLE SAM'S EXPERTS ON FARMING IN COOS AND CURRY

SOIL SURVEY OF THE MARSHFIELD AREA ACCORDING TO THE OFFICIAL GOVERNMENT REPORT OF C. W. MANN AND JAS. E. FERGUSON.

Some relatively small areas of soils usually abrupt and is marked by a distinct change of color and texture. The upper part of the soil contains a large proportion of fibrous roots and partially decayed organic matter, which produce a darker shade of color to a depth of 6 to 12 inches and give an apparent lighter texture than is revealed by mechanical analysis. When first cleared the soil cultivates easily and is quite friable, but it becomes compact and more difficult to handle after a few seasons of cultivation.

The Riverton clay loam covers the greater part of the uplands in Coos county within the limits of the survey. It is most extensively developed in the northern half of the area, where the more important parts of the type occur. The soil passes gradually into adjacent soil types occurring in the uplands, the line of separation being vague and difficult to determine. As this type is mainly confined to the hilly uplands, the surface topography is exceedingly rough and broken. The hill slopes are often steep, though the crests are usually well rounded or terraced. In the outlying areas along the east side and in the southern part of the survey the roughest areas are found.

The Riverton clay loam owes its origin to the weathering of the sandstones and shales of the Arago formation, which is recognized in the geology of the region as belonging to the Eocene period, and which has been locally subdivided into the Pulaski and Coaledo formations, which together cover almost the entire northern three-quarters of the area, the latter containing valuable deposits of coal. The soil material is of residual and colluvial origin, and forms a mantle of considerable depth over the greater part of the region. The dense forest growth effectively protects the soil from washing and gullyng even on the steepest slopes. Practically the entire area is covered with original or second-growth timber. In the vicinity of Coos Bay and along the larger streams much of the virgin timber has been removed, and has been replaced by a thick and almost impenetrable growth of fir, spruce, alder, and other small trees. The virgin forests of fir, cedar, spruce and hemlock are found mainly in private forest reserves.

A considerable portion of the area occupied by this soil type is too rough to be well adapted to clearing and cultivation. Such areas should undoubtedly remain forested. A considerable part of the more level areas would appear to justify ultimately the clearing of the second-growth trees and brush and the utilization of such areas for agricultural purposes. As yet no large tracts have been cleared and brought under cultivation. It is largely held in homesteads of 100 acres or in larger tracts.

Upon the lighter phases of the Riverton clay loam truck crops have been found to yield well when planted in the spring and given proper cultivation. While only a few small areas of the soil have been under cultivation for more than two or three years, experience has shown that the soil is well adapted to most of the crops produced on the bottom lands. Oats, wheat, red and white clover, vetch, and in certain places alfalfa have given good yields on this soil type. In favorable locations the type is well adapted to the production of bush fruits, apples, pears, plums, and other deciduous fruits. Recently a number of small orchards have been planted in the Coos River and Coquille River Valleys and in other places. The principal varieties of apples found in these sections are Gravenstein, Baldwin, Spitzenberg and a few less common sorts. The Gravenstein which is the leading variety for market, is of excellent quality. The Riverton clay loam is especially adapted to the production of loganberries, blackberries and strawberries.

The use of stable manure and the growing of green-manure crops would be very useful in maintaining the productivity of the soil. The early planting of most crops is also desirable in order to secure the largest possible growth before the beginning of the season of dry weather.

The Want Ads Are News

"The Times" classified columns are news columns just as much as any other part of the paper—they are up-to-the-minute, live announcements that reflect the needs of various businesses and households; they tell in short, concise way, the most sought for necessities of scores of individuals.

Some are in search of work, and they tell what they can do best; some in need of helpers, some have goods for sale, some want to exchange certain merchandise, some wish partners to aid them in their business, some are seeking to regain lost articles—these and many other needs are a part of the classified section; all making up the sum of modern home and business requisites.

"Times" want ads are intensely interesting, full of human desire and radiant with possibilities for all who will use them to accomplish any legitimate purpose.
