IF IT PAYS.

ONE OF the encouraging signs in the development of modern industry is the growing realization on the part of corporations that humane methods pay. There is a tendency to accept the idea that to conserve the health and efficiency of the wage earning classes is not only humane but businesslike.

Social betterment workers have found this argument for greater efficiency and larger output one of their strongest arguments with the employer of paid labor. There is another side to the same idea and that is the evolution of the laborer through this very process of increased efficiency. Of course this is the side that most concerns the sociologist. But when it can be generally recognized and proved that a system of care and consideration works both ways and pays from the standpoint of both employer and employed, the difficulties of capital and labor will begin to be at an end.
