A SONG FROM FAR AWAY.

Of your day I claim no part,
Not a look, not a touch,
Not a beat of your dear heart,
That were too much.

Only let me take my place
In your dreams through the night,
I will pass and leave no trace
Ere the east grows light.

You shall waken with a smile,
Smiling still as you muse,
How you dreamed of love awhile,
But forgetting whose.

—Amelia Josephine Burr.

THAT several years of education for motherhood be included in the regular curriculum of the public schools and that this course be completed by training that shall approximate the work of the Kindergarten Training college is the scheme advocated by Kate Douglas Wiggin, known in private life as Mrs. George C. Riggs. Her idea has been spoken of as a "municipal school for brides to be."

"It may or may not be municipal," she explained. "My idea is for a course of training in which all school girls shall take part. Then when marriage comes they will be ready for it."

"The school should teach the girls to be capable, useful, home making mothers, not just housekeepers and nurses, but mothers. That's what we need."

"I believe heartily in teaching girls to sew and cook, bake and sweep and keep house," she said. "But I believe in teaching them lots more than that. Why, that isn't a scintilla of what I think our girls ought to be taught before they marry."

"I think they should be taught not only to feed and clothe their children, but to bring them up, not only to make a home comfortable, but to make it happy, to make a stand for the best there is in life. Girls ought to learn how to do those things, and it is perfectly possible to teach them."

"I think that girls should be so educated—in the public schools, I trust—that they will take hold of the humbler tasks of life with a real ardor."

"And first they must be taught to take hold of the humbler tasks capably."

"I want girls taught to bring a sense of responsibility and a sense of beauty into wifehood and motherhood and the training of children. This means that they must bring knowledge. It means that they must have received practical training. It means that they must have had experience with children. And it means that they must have been taught to realize the finer phases of home making."

Mrs. Riggs has been thinking of this matter for years; has been observing the trend of life about her; has looked into homes, looked into public schools, looked into kindergartens and teachers' colleges, looked into day nurseries. She is armed for the discussion, not only to "back up" her theories with facts and figures, but to state clearly what kind of a school is needed and what it shall teach.

"I have often said and emphatically believe that the final months in a young woman's education should be spent in a kindergarten training college or some equivalent for such an institution."

"As matters are now arranged the responsibilities which she will probably assume are never so much as mentioned in the school curriculum."

"Girls finish their education unprepared for motherhood."

"Positively might say, in examining the courses of study in our schools today, that this generation must have been training colts."

The ordinary public school education falls in fitting girls for motherhood, Mrs. Riggs declares, and the "higher" education falls even more lamentably. That 50 per cent of the girls that leave college enter unprepared upon marriage is reason enough, she contends, for the immediate establishment of a motherhood training school.

"I suppose that the average college girl, with her splendid intellectual training, is fitted to be the intellectual mother of the strong sons," she mused, "but when she marries she will have just ordinary little babies to train, aid, teach and to discipline. She leaves college unprepared for the duties that await her."

greens. A huge wedding bell of white was suspended immediately over the place where the minister stood. The Reverend Mr. Yost of Florence performed the ceremony and united the happy couple. The bride, Miss Schillerstrom, was gowned in an exquisitely beautiful blue silk wedding gown and her bridesmaids were dressed in handsome gowns of the same material. The Misses Cyna and Tyna Beck attended the bride as maids of honor and did their part to make the wedding a beautiful and impressive one. The groom's attendants were Messrs. Arthur Reynolds and Ray David. After an elaborate wedding supper, the guests and the happy pair danced in the Beck home until a late hour. A great number of valuable and beautiful wedding gifts were received by the bride and groom among which were several articles of cut glass including a water pitcher, and a complete set of sauce dishes, decanter, etc. There were quite a few gifts of table silver. One of the unique gifts was an order for enough shingles to cover a house from the Point Terrace Mill company in which the groom has an interest. Mr. and Mrs. Beck will be at home after their honeymoon, at the Beck place on the Siuslaw river.
