A GOOD PLANK

TERE is a plank from the platform of the mayor of Cleve-land, Ohio, and it covers the whole ground in a few words: is my ambition, not that Cleveland should be a city of a million people, but that it should be a city worthy of a million people. We want a city people, where of healthy, happy good sanitation is provided; where public utilities give the highest mensure of comfort and convenience at the lowest cost; where education is the best and homes and business places of the highest types. not say that Athens had a large number of inhabitants. Its fame was built by the kind of people who lived there, the way they lived, and what they did."

THE SEA.

I place the seal of my approval upon the wild, majestic set. waves, in turmoil and removal, raise noble sentiments in me. I used to view the roaring breakers, the heaving leagues of brindled brine. rather have a million acres of mead-ewland," I'd say, "in mine." The sea I thought was quite too wasteful, took too much room in which to roll; extravagance is quite distasteful to every thoughtful, frugal soul, If half the seas were virgin prairie what oats and corn we all might raise! And that would make the whole world merry and fill with ecs-tacy our days. If all the billows that wage battle upon the stern and rocky shore were grass, they'd feed a billion cattle, and fifty million hogs or more. But all that space for which man wishes, in which to wield his plows and rakes, is given up to cheap john fishes, and mermaids, cels and water snakes. I am older now and saner, I do less thinking with my tongue, and many wital facts are plainer than e'er they seemed when I was young. The sea is nature's object lesson, placed here to show us where we're at. Sometimes me head (I am confessin') swells up until it strains my hat: sometimes I entertain the notion that I'm the biggest thing in view. I only meed to see the ocean and then I shrivel up a few. WALT MASON

THE GROCER'S REASON.

I stopped and asked a groc'ry man fust why he charged six bits per can for coffee that I used to buy at price about one-third as high. threw his hands up in the air and asked me if I thought 'twas fair to butt in on his business line instead of watching closely mine.

"But, friend," I said, "I cannot see why you don't kindly answer me. You need not, my poor feelings shurn. I pay you ev'ry cent I earn."

He donned a condescending smile and said, "Old man, sit down a I charge you higher prices because we all have made a vow to stick together in our trade until the cows come from the glade. You've got to have my stuff to eat Just as you have Old Bilker's meat, and since you almost have to buy, FII raise my prices to the sky."

persuading him to try some plan along the lines of Golden Rule. promptly said, "You are a fool." I sold him that I'd start a store, and eall the people to my door with cheering words and pleasant tones, and glean from them their old iron

He smiled in pity, shook his head, and asked me in what burg I's bred. "Our bunch would quickly freeze you out before you'd half-way turn about. The people would not to you because they'd think your goods were bum. You would no shining skeckels reap for no one wants to buy things cheap."

There's something wrong-I know not where. It's going through this Western air. With combinations all around, we're all by monstrous prices bound. But then, perhaps, twould be the same without this combination game, for when we're sailing amooth and nice, maybe we want to pay the price.
