THE DANCE.

One dance they call the two-step and the other one the waltz, but, sure, poor Mick the Pinstoner, whose left leg badly halts, ay, faith, such dances Mick himself, with all his halt could do them for he would say, as I say too, there's not much dancin' to them, but, Mick, he wouldn't dance such things; he isn't so far gone—begor, 'twould make the poor man blush the way they carry on with bunny hugs and turkey trots and such outrageous prancin', such work perhaps is something else, but, faith, it is not dancin'!

But now, you take an Irish jig, a double or a reel, and if you have a heart at all I think 'twill make you feel, The steppin', leppin', reel and toe, so deftly done, so caseful, as here and there in turn they go so charming and so graceful, The liltin' of the tune itself would make you catch your breath 'twould stir the soul within you in the very vale of death! And while the feet are keeping time and lightly, brightly glancin' and ask you if there's something there that looks to you like dancin'!

But as for turkey trots and such, that now are all the go, They're nothing like the dances that we danced in guld Mayo in Summer at the crossroads, or in Winter on the door That lifted off its hinges, made a stage upon the floor, Sure, anyone can dance today—and even poor old Mick could do as well as most of them, for all he has a stick! That is, if he would condescend to such outrageous prancin', but, sure, I know that, like myself, he wouldn't call that dancin'!
