These Things Thou Art. These things thou art to me, dear; The purity of snows; The dusk upon the lea, dear; The perfume of the rose,

These things thou art to me, dear; The thought in midnight skies; The mystery of the sea, dear;

These things thou shalt be,aye, dear; The song the soul-wind blows; The vision none may see, dear; The world no language knows.

These things thou art to me, dear The birdeall after rain; The promise in the sky, dear; The peace that follows pain.

are capable of motives worthier than pink candy, together with all the rest of the "goodies" which are ently and hurriedly to hear:
"Is this Mrs. Brown's? No? Wrong number." and the connection is abzuptly broken. No apology, not the alightest infection of voice or turn speech to indicate the speaker's polite regret at the inconvenience she has caused. She feels that we do not know who she is, and so graciously is unimportant, This style of conduct is common in feed. Many people going into a foreign land or a strange town behave form a "stunt", rudely, obtrusively, objectionably—as they would never dream of doing in any place where they might be recogmized. Evidently their point of view is that politeness and consideration are desirable, not because they make the world pleasanter, but because they reflect credit upon themselves

For them the decencies and niceties of life are based, not upon self-respect, but upon social expediency, and the moment such expediency seems unnecessary they revolt to their inate boorishness. The man who puts his dusty feet on the plush seat in a railway coach because no one who knows him happens to be there to condemn him, and because he does not care who comes after him, is typical of that attitude which makes the wheels of social and civic progress move so slowly.

Whoever cares sincerely for his fellows cares for them whether they happen to be his personal friends, or people he never saw, and he is gentle and kind because he wishes to make and kind because he wishes to make Lyons, George Blake, them comfortable, not because he wishes to make himself popular.

All action that makes for betterment and all true nobleness springs from the disinterested desire to help. others and to make life easier and sweeter for them in every way pos-

BIRTHDAY PARTY

On last Saturday afternoon little Louise Lockhart was guest of hon-or to a number of her little friends in the neighborhood the affair being to celebrate her fourth birthday. At precisely three o'clock, the appointed hour, each guest was on the scene at the Herbert Lockhart home, to do honor to the little hostess. They played out door games, after which they were seated at a table in the center of which was a large birthday cake bearing the name "Louise", and other toothsome delicacles. They had a glorious time and arrived home too excited to talk. Those present were: Eleanor Flan-agan, Margaret Luse, Catherine Stump, Rosemary Richardson, Virginia Coke and Doris Sengstacken.
