PEOPLE who live for the sake of impressing other people—and there are a surprising number of these—are very much like children who think that the reflection which looks out at them from a mirror is not an image but a real person. There is nothing more ephemeral than the effect which we produce upon those who casually pass us, and yet some women spend more of their time and thought and money dressing for this very purpose than they spend in making themselves interesting to their friends, or comforting to their families, as the girl who pays six times more for an opera cloak to dazzle strangers than she would for some pleasure of convenience which would enrich the whole family life. It is commendable to do our part in adding to the gaiety and attractiveness of the human procession. To dress pleasingly and cultivate gentle manners and to be gracious and kind is our due to the other human beings with whom we share this goodly frame, the earth. But when this desire becomes paramount we have superficiality.

What counts is what we are, not what we appear to be. Nobility of nature is what gives us genuine distinction. If half the time invested in vain endeavor to appear well bred or well read were used to become either of these things the result would be vastly satisfactory.

Our appearance, our very gestures and facial expressions are symbols of what we are within.
