THE EDITOR'S TROUBLES

It sometimes seems to me that more untoward circumstances, to use a rather high-sounding term for trouble, gloom, grief, errors, and other unpleasant incidents, happen in a country print shop than any other place of equal floor area on God's gay and green footstool.

The Times office has been the scene of several the past week. The trouble started a week ago when the foreman met with an accident which incapacitated him. This during the busy holiday rush put an extra burden on all in the office. In the rush more than the usual quota of errors crept into the paper, but the climax put on an extra cap last night when a series of typographical errors revealed and rioted in the columns. First, my friend, "Bob Stanley" had a poem on "Christmas Troubles," but the man with Christmas troubles would think them trifles light as air compared with the editor's troubles. When "Bob Stanley" read his poem and found it bungled and butchered because a half line had been dropped in the first part of the poem which rendered the remainder senseless. He was made to write of "mimmed brass" and put up "frones," whatever they may be. "Misfortunes never come singly," and according to our old friend Lindley Murray, or whoever it was that invented grammar, it is not strange, because "misfortunes" being plural cannot be singular. Anyway, a little later the editor found the menu of the refreshments served at the Arago Hotel ball at Empire was turned upside down and twisted out of shape, beginning with "nuts," and ending with "soup." There were others, but those two were sufficient for a banquet of brickbats. These two articles are reprinted herewith in a more nearly correct form to preserve a better record of things newspaperial.

Christmas Troubles

—BY—BOB STANLEY.

I'm waiting for the holidays, and trying to devise some ways and means by which I won't offend some one who calls himself my friend, by some cheap present I must send. This fellow always sends to me some present costly as can be and makes me feel I must return a masterpiece in painting, urn or hammered brass bedecked with fern, or something else that costs a mint. That's why I always have to stint and starve, and wear old clothes, and save, and pass up all things that I crave, and yet, put up a front that's brave, when Christmas time is drawing near. He makes me worry half a year about the things I have to buy to send along with my reply in which I thank him—with a sigh. When he is sending me some prize in jewelry that hurts my eye, he doesn't know sometimes I soak his present with some Hebrew bloke, so I can make returns, when broke.

I do not wish to be a "Spug," a hold-up man, or thief, or thug, but I will surely fall from grace unless this friend of mine will chase his costly presents past my place.

The trouble with this Christmas game lies in the fact we do not name a limit when we start to play. Our friends get wild and run away, and we must borrow if we stay. I always like to have a friend send something to me that will spend him just about what I can stand. I don't want anything that's grand, so cut the price to beat the band.
