"SUNSET"

Written for The Times by Captain T. J. Macgenn.

A light breeze fanned the heaving swell,
The sun sent forth a parting beam,
The blue clouds serve as colored glass,
To add more lustre to the scene.

Down, down, she held her headlong course,
Till great Neptune's wave she did imbue,
And the Western heavens are a-glow
With rolling clouds of varied hue.

Refraction seemed to stay her course,
There in her majesty she shone,
No mortal could that picture paint,
The artist must be God alone.

But when she kissed the surging brine,
Her image over the waves she threw
And like a God she did descend
And sank in the waves serene and blue.

DOES any woman of your acquaintance gush? If she does, aren't you often tempted to tell her flatly that she makes you sick?

There are two kinds of women that are trying on the nerves in two distinctly different ways. One always tells you that you are the dearest, the sweetest, the loveliest thing on earth.

You would like to believe her, and feel sort of warm and comfortable all over, likewise somewhat puffed up. Then you hear her saying exactly the same thing to some one else, who without the slightest feeling of envy or misjudgment you know is about as commonplace as they make them.

In consequence when the gusher tells you that your hat is really the most becoming thing, you are inclined to snatch it off and never wear it again.

In contradiction to the gusher is the horribly frank individual who tells you the plain, unvarnished truth, taking particular pains to pick out the unpleasant rather than the pleasing features on which to dilate at length.

You meet her on the street and she greets you in this cheerful fashion: "For heaven's sake what have you been doing to your face?"

When you assure her that you didn't know anything was the matter with it she proceeds to analyze your wrinkles, the added lines between your eyes, your new way of wearing your hair that makes you look older, and leaves you feeling about as cheerful as a graveyard.

This type of woman—you all know her—resents it as a personal insult if you suggest that she would look better in blue than in pink, but she doesn't hesitate in telling every one she meets just what she thinks of their get up, whether the criticism hurts or not.

While the gusher is to be sat down upon hard she really is not as unkind as the outspoken one.

A good rule for us all to follow, is to say nothing, if we can't say something pleasant, not however feeling that this means that everything is "too sweet for words," "just the dearest," etc., etc.

CLUBS

Mrs. W. B. Scott will be hostess to the Royal Auction Bridge Club at her home in the Williams Apartments next Tuesday afternoon.

After a week's respite, it is expected that there will be more than the usual social activity and while few invitations have been issued, a number of social functions are being planned by the various ones.
