THE STORY OF AMERICA IN PICTURES THE DISCOVERERS

"LEARN ONE THING EVERY DAY"

NO. 5. JACQUES CARTIER

Copyright, 1913, by The Associated Newspaper School, Inc.

IT IS a peculiar fact that about the early life of the discoverer of the St. Lawrence River, Jacques Cartier, so little is known. He was born in 1491, but this great French navigator is first heard of in 1534, when on the 20th of April he started from St. Malo in command of an expedition consisting of two ships and 61 men to look for a northwest passage to the East. This is what most of the early discoverers and explorers were trying to find. They were not farseeing enough to know that this great savage country that blocked their way to India was some day to be one of the richest and greatest lands in the world. So when the French trade to Brazil in South America was stopped, Cartier set out in 1534 to find a way to the mystic East with its fabulous wealth.

He reached Newfoundland on May 10, and at once entered the strait of Belle Isle, then called the Bay of Castles by the fishermen. But the land was found to be barren and rocky. So Cartier sailed away from there on June 15, and cruised down the west coast of Newfoundland and up the coast of New Brunswick. He anchored for ten days in Caspe Harbor, where he made friends with some Huron-Iroquois Indians from Quebec. Two of these he carried away with him. At last, however, he had to give up his search for a northwest passage that year, and sail back to France.

France were with him. They told Cartier that Saguenay was the name of a kingdom "rich and wealthy in precious stones."

This was great news to the navigator, and he resolved to find this kingdom. In longboats he set off up the St. Lawrence River. On October 2 he came upon the Huron-Iroquois village of Hochelaga. This village was situated exactly where the city of Montreal now stands.

Cartier found that he couldn't go up the river any farther because of the swift Lachine Rapids were in his way. He climbed to the top of Mount Royal, which still bears the name he gave it, and saw the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa stretching away to the west. When he got back to where he had left his vessels he seized the chief and eleven of the head men of the village and carried them away with him, in order to give the King of France accurate information about this great rich country of the north which he had not seen.

In 1541 Cartier made a persevering attempt to discover this land of dreams, but without success. He never reached the mythical Saguenay. On September 1, 1557, Jacques Cartier died.

Every day a different human interest story will appear in The Times.
