AT FORTY.

When forty winters shall besiege thy brow
And dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field,
Thy youth's proud livery, so gaze on now,
Will be a tattered weed, of small worth held.

—Shakespeare.

What! Forty winters mar her lovely brow
And leave her with no reason to aspire?
Once forty may have been old age, but now
At forty woman still has youthful fire.
The beauty who at twenty-five may please
Declines at forty to be grim and stout.
While at the hopeful age of forty she's
But fully blown and fairly rounded out.

She dances and she flirts, she charms the eye;
Her careless laughter causes hearts to leap.
The beauty doctors all their art apply
To keep her furrows from becoming deep.
When forty winters have pursued their course,
She may not even have her first divorce.

She is a poor hostess who is always entertaining suspicions.

THE main dish—the piece de resistance, as the French say—in the great majority of homes is husband, either served plain, or with a sauce diablo, yet, unfortunately, the great majority never learn how to prepare this staple article of diet so that it either agrees with them or is palatable to their tastes. To properly preserve a husband begin by selecting your husband with great care, says Dorothy Dix. Do not pick out one that is too young for it will be callow and flavorless, and it will soon pall upon your palate. Besides it requires too much watching to make it worth the trouble of preserving. Neither choose one that is too old for it will be tough and cross-grained and soured by age.

But choose a husband of medium age, not too young and not too old, and pay more attention to whether it is sound and sweet, and ripe and mellow and tender than you do to its looks. Be careful to see that the husband you pick out has not a rotten heart, and is not either tart and acid or too mushy, for neither of these specimens can be successfully preserved for home consumption. The only thing that can be done with them is to pickle them in alcohol.

Having selected your husband, carry it home without shaking it, and keep it under lock and key. Much depends upon our carefulness in this respect, for about any of our lady friends have kleptomaniac tendencies and a sweet tooth, and when they see a real sugar-plum of a husband that has been left lying unguarded around the house they are sometimes tempted to steal it.

Good housekeepers are divided as to whether husbands should be skinned or not before preserving. Some hold that the first thing to do with a husband is to peel off its bark rind, contending that it is easier to keep it that way, while others argue that separating a husband from its small change is all that is necessary, and that if you remove all of its long green from it, it is apt to sour on you and ferment.

As both processes are successful it seems to be a matter of individual skill with the housewife, so the young wife may take her choice of methods.

The husband is now ready for the last process of preserving. The old way, in vogue in our mothers' time, was to salt it down in brine. This was done by a housewife keeping on tap a large supply of tears which she poured over her husband morning, noon and night, until he was as sticky and salty as a keg of codfish.

This means of keeping a husband did not prove satisfactory however, and the modern scientific woman preserves her husband in sugar instead of salt.

To do this make a syrup of home comforts consisting of 365 good dinners a year, a clean and cheerful house, with a wife who is a ministering angel in it, flavor this mixture with enough independence to keep a man guessing—bushels of love, a dash of devilry, entertaining conversation to taste, a liberal supply of laughter and a practically unlimited amount of jolly and flattering.

Steep the husband in this mixture and keep it simmering on the hearthstone, and you will have no trouble in turning out an article of the preserved husband that would take a prize at any county fair and be easily salable at a woman's exchange.

N. E.—The success in preserving a husband lies in making the domestic sauce so sweet and strong that the kind made away from home will seem weak and flavorless beside it. This recipe for preserving husbands has been tried by our experts and it is guaranteed to work. Follow it and you cannot fail.
