FOR YOU

For you the winds are in the trees,
and bees and birds are lyrical,
For you the fresh leaves flicker
Out a mile along the lane;
For you, at dusk, doth God repeat
His ancient starry miracle—
For you the scurrie of the dawn,
For you the dancing rain.

Of you the grass is gossiping,
of you the winds are amorous,
Of you the waves are whispering
Along the sandy bar.
Of you the bluebirds in the trees
With myriad throats are clamorous—
And all the swallows twittering
How wonderful you are.

In search of you the butterflies
On golden wings are wandering,
And violets are looking out
With peering, purple eyes;
For you the yellow jessamine
Its bright doubleblossoms is squandering,
And for you the Epic Earth
Goes singing through the skies.

THE week just closed has been very quiet. Society is taking advantage of the Lenten season apparently to rest from the continued round of gaiety that made the winter so pleasant, says an exchange.

"I always save up my calls until Lent," remarked a lovely young matron, as she slipped a bit of pastiche-board out of her cardcase. "There is never a minute from the first of October until Ash Wednesday to give to this rapidly disappearing duty. In a few years from now the custom of paying formal calls will have become obsolete."

She is probably right in her prediction. Women are really too busy in this enfranchised age to keep up a form that is in its very nature, so unsatisfactory. Besides we meet our friends in other and more delightful ways. Women's clubs have in a measure made the paying of formal calls unnecessary even if we had time for them.

Meantime the Lenten season is a good time to pay off those calling debts which cannot be evaded or ignored. It is also a proper time to consider a little those things which are of more importance even than discharging one's social obligations, namely: How many of the things we allow ourselves to become burdened with in the way of social duties are really worth while? Do we spend our time to the best advantage, and can we not get more actual satisfaction out of life by letting some of the lesser things go and giving less attention to non-essentials?

"But Easter follows Lent, and we must consider our spring attire," Angelic admonishes me. "For we, also, are not clothed like the lilies of the field without effort or thought on our part."

She assures me that she always devotes a part of the Lenten season to the serious consideration of her wardrobe, and adds that she believes most women do. Perhaps she is right.

YOUNG PEOPLES ASSOCIATION

A number of the members of the senior class of Emmanuel Church Sunday School gathered in Guild Hall on Thursday evening for the purpose of organizing a branch of the Anglican Young People's Association, an organization of the Church of England in Canada. The chapter was formed through the adoption of the constitution and the election of officers, as follows, President Miss Helen M. Corning, Secetary, Norris Farrin, Vice President, Abbie Ledward, Treasurer, Doris Sengstacken. It was decided to hold the meetings on the first and third Tuesday of the month. The object of the association, as seen in its motto, "For Christ and the Church," is primarily religious, although provision is made in the constitution for social and literary evenings, and is composed of both boys and girls. Before the adjournment of the meeting Thursday evening, the President appointed several committees to arrange for the various features of the work of this chapter. The first meeting in April will probably be a social one, in order to acquaint others with the character of the work. The rector or incumbent of the parish is Patron of the association and has the general oversight in all matters.

The following members of the class were present: Doris Sengstacken, Hutton O'Connor, Abbie Ledward, Marion Horsfall, Ruth Goldon, Agnes Johnson, Bessie Finagan, Florence Flanagan Norris and Grace Farrin, George Deubner, Leland Bayliss, Miss Helen M.
