Through the grey dawning of a better day,
The bells of freedom strike the woman's hour.
No longer world-old pleadings block her way
To sturdier weapons and the grip of power,
Through the long centuries of licensed wrong,
Keeping its trust with policy and greed,
There was no place for woman in the throng,
Her place to toil and suffer,—men's to lead.
In war, she gave the fruitage of her life,
Since she must mother all who live or die;
Her heart, like men's bled in the crucial strife;
She squandered love, and self, nor questioned why.
But justice, long delayed, unto the skies
Lifts now its clarion voice to Patriots true,
And she, a Patriot, hears the call,
"Arise!
The old has passed away, behold the new!"
—Helle Butterfield.

In this season of weddings—elaborate and simple—it is worth while to turn attention to some interesting and important costumes. The bride is fortunate who has a wedding veil of rare old lace which has been worn by her mother as a bride, or which is a precious heirloom of the family. But a veil of tulle is always charming in its simplicity and so becoming that it never loses favor.

A wedding veil is a distinctive part of the attire of a bride who wears a white bridal gown. Some imagine that the custom applies only to the occasion of a ceremonious wedding says an exchange. Of course, for a church wedding it is obligatory for one in bridal dress to wear a veil, according to the rule that women should have their heads covered in a church, but for a home wedding there is no rule. It seems a mistake, however, for a young girl not to follow the appropriate custom, even for the most informal home ceremony.

But once in a lifetime may a wedding veil and orange blossoms be worn. Artificial orange blossoms are the only allowable artificial flowers for a bride. If fresh flowers are used they may be the natural orange blossoms, or tiles of the valley, or white orchids, but the latter are seldom used, and as fresh flowers are apt to fade and thus present a disconsolate appearance, they had best be avoided. The traditional orange blossoms, in artificial spray or wreaths, are always satisfactory.

The wedding gown may be of satin.

use, crepe de chine, chiffon, moire, or brocade, or some dainty, filmy white material. Even organdy, of finest quality, may be chosen for a very youthful bride and if expense must be considered.

Always, it must be remembered, there is perfect dignity and propriety in the simplest wedding where the bride wears a plain traveling dress and with only near relatives present. A strict rule of etiquette is that the bride's family shall pay all expenses of the wedding, the trousseau, invitations, collation, everything connected with the wedding. Wedding plans are made therefore, in accordance with what the bride's parents can afford. The bridegroom is not permitted to pay for anything except the ring, the fee to the clergymen, a gift and bouquet for the bride, bouquets or presents to bridesmaids, and presents to the ushers and best man.

A bride who is a widow does not wear white, nor does she wear a veil. As a general rule she chooses gray, or mauve, with a hat. Her preference usually is to wear a traveling dress.

A dress and hat suitable to be worn later for visiting, or similar occasions, may be worn by any bride for the ceremony, and change for a "going-away" gown.

If a gown intended to be used for traveling is to be worn for ceremony it is selected with the intention of not being conspicuous for traveling.
