THE MODERN WOMAN.

I shall not lie to you any more,
Flatter or fawn to attain my end,
I am what never has been before,
Woman—and Friend—

I shall be strong as a man is strong,
I shall be fair as a man is fair,
Hand in locked hand we shall pass along
In a purer air.

I shall not drag on your bridle rein,
Knee touching knee we shall ride
the hill,
I shall not lie to you ever again,
Will you love me still?
—Markaret Widdemer.

THE lingerie or washable petticoat which has been out of style for a decade is to be the vogue. This will mean a vastly increased cotton consumption and will go a long way toward the solution of the problem of finding an immediate market for the South's oversupply of cotton.

The Fashion Art League of America, which has secured the pledges of thousands of dressmakers, club women and social leaders throughout the United States to follow its fashion suggestions, through its president, Mme. Alla Ripley, has sent broadcast to its members and affiliated organizations in all parts of the nation the following fashion suggestion:

"Women of discriminating taste in dressing are taking kindly to the wider skirt and during the ensuing winter this garment will again come into general acceptance. Already it is being seen. With the return of this vogue, the washable petticoat is advocated. In fact, it will become almost a necessity because of its warmth and protection. It was not necessary with the narrow skirt, but with the wider garment will prove welcome through its practical value.

The Fashion Art League of America urges its members to diligently advocate this style, for the return of the washable petticoat will go a long way toward solving the cotton problem. Every woman will necessarily add several to her wardrobe. The cotton dress is out of the question for northern women in the winter months.

As to the width of the skirt the question now agitating American women is: 'How wide shall that skirt be?'

"This question is of more importance just now than the length of coats to the woman who always wants to be in the latest mode. Good taste dictates that the size and height of the wearer should be considered in choosing a new style that changes the silhouette as radically as does a skirt the bottom of which suddenly widens from one yard to four yards. This would not be an extreme style for a woman of five feet five or six who weighs one hundred and fifty pounds, but certainly would be for a slight woman of four feet and a half, and would probably make the short fat woman look ten to fifteen pounds heavier. There is no denying that a circular cut skirt is more beautiful when it falls full and free and has an air of smartness when worn by the right type, but beware of the pitfalls of blindly accepting a circular cut in your new suit skirt. In chiffons and nets you can choose with greater freedom. The extra width in the hem that fashion now demands and the Fashion Art League of America recommends lies somewhere between two and four yards and can be obtained by the judicious use of pleats, circular godet effects let in at the sides or it can be cut slightly circular, shirred into the belt line or perhaps a gored circular would be better. There are many ways the clever dressmaker can suit the style to the woman if she is not compelled to follow an absolute model, and the individualities thus obtained will be quickly recognized and appreciated by the well dressed woman.

"To be in vogue then in our skirts this winter we must have a smooth flat hip look with a decided flare at the hem and, if the figure permits, the fullness should be accentuated at the sides and flattened at front and back. To distinguish this skirt from the one you wore seven years ago the dressmaker will probably accentuate the way look at the edge by a shallow scallop or a slight lifting at front or sides."
