SCHOOL CRITICISM NO. 2
 To the Editor of The Times:
 The honest person fears not criticism, be that criticism fair or false, opportune or inopportune.
 The value of any criticism lies in the ability of the critic to express himself on the particular subject which he criticizes. To illustrate: a lawyer, however able in his own subject of law, would make a poor critic as to the value of a quiz class in medicine. A banker, however capable in money matters, would not by that virtue be the right person to advise the scientific farmer. Again, a man might be worth several thousand dollars a year to handle the investments of a big corporation, but useless as the adviser of the handling of a $500 shoe stock. A person might be an expert bridge player, but wholly without ability to judge good music or competent methods in the sick room; or a woman with a plenty of judgment on salads and cake making might be the poorest sort of a critic for a cooking class and absolutely ignorant of the merits or demerits of a teacher in history or language. So much does the value of criticism depend on the ability of the critic in the subject under consideration that any criticism without this ability becomes either mere fault finding, empty self or spiteful arrogance.
 The human being is born to love flattery and to dislike, if not to hate, to hear about his faults. The average man or woman in asking for criticism asks not for truth, but for approval in that which he is doing or about to do. Therefore, he is apt to ask criticism not of those really competent to criticize, but of those who will make him a pleasant if not an efficient and truthful answer.

prone is the human being to love and embrace comfort and self approval rather than truth, that he finds it an easy matter to persuade himself that he has really advanced in thought and method when he has been told by his friends that he is a capital fellow and incapable of error. No matter how inefficient the judgment of those friends on the subject in hand may be, the average man or woman hugs the belief that because the persons honored by being his friends are his friends, they must possess good judgment on any subject.
 The person thus receiving criticism, asked or unasked, of those who speak only pleasant things, goes about his work feeling very righteous in the approval of those whose advice he receives, and he really feels their approval, however inefficient, to be a bulwark in his work, even though in his own mind he knows and winks at weaknesses that are unattained cannot see.
 Here and there in life a person is to be met who really cares for truth more than he cares for his own personal comfort or his own personal gain. Before such a character the person of small and selfish worth is a coward. He is always uncomfortable because he feels himself to be on trial. In his own mind he knows that he is in danger of becoming known even as he knows himself. He knows that his possibility of "deceiving all the people all the time" is getting smaller. He knows that his work does not ring sound in the presence of honest and intelligent criticism, so he begins defense by assailing the weak points of his critic. He does this usually in ways so small and suave that no one guesses what he is about. He seeks to discredit in the minds of the public all good from anyone who shows up the weaknesses of his own work.
 In history no other calling outside of the church has been so slow to accept and profit by criticism as has education. All competent educators admit this fact and its corollary, that the public schools do not turn out persons in general who are capable of judging the merits of those schools. These are facts in educational history admitted by everyone who has a full view of the situation. So it follows that a public school system, be it of a state, a county or a city, is at the mercy of its superintendent; whether he is a man of honor or the cheapest sort of a politician, who looks first to bulwarking his own position and second to the good of the schools. No other profession offers such opportunity for incompetent criticism and for wolf-management in shops of clothing, as does teaching.
 When Christ taught that "the sins of the fathers were to be visited upon the children, even to the third and fourth generation," he must have had in mind the public school and its product, for no where else in life can the sins of the fathers be seen so plainly as in the poor management of and poor teaching in, our public schools.
 The future usefulness of the public school as the basis of true democracy lies in the sins of those in charge being honorably and openly acknowledged and set right and not in their being left to bear fruit under ignorant management and incompetent criticism.
