MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Interesting Music Program For Library Opening

WAR SONG.

THE WAR has provided us with something more than horror and ridiculous prejudice. It has provided us with features that approach the sympathetic and indeed, the humorous.

We are told that the Germans going into battle sing a new song, the refrain of which is "Deutschland Ueber Alles." And that, when they are in the trenches, they relieve the tedium of bombardment by performances on the gramophones which they carry with them.

"Tommy Atkins," as the English common soldier is called, too, relieves his tedium during a bombardment by playing football, as the shrapnel burst over him, greatly to the disgust of the Germans, who also cannot understand why, when he regales himself with music, he should sing such absurd songs as "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary," also a war song, the refrain of which is "Send me mother, Send me brother, Send me mother-in-law, But don't send me."

You see, the Germans have no idea that Tommy Atkins possesses an inimitable sense of humor. They would have some idea of it if they had ever read "Soldiers Three" by Kipling. Little Plou-Plou, the French soldier, also sings his songs as he marches along on the road to battle.

As for the Russian soldier, "Ivan," as he is called, he has always been passionately fond of songs. He composes songs himself, in which he lauds his sweetheart, his village, his home, his favorite horse and general. Singing in the Russian ranks is encouraged by the officers. A chief singer marches at the front of each company and gives the lines of the words of each verse to be sung. The Cossack songs are said to be particularly full of life and vigor.
