THE MODERN GIRL.

We knock and criticize her,
We scold, apostrophize her,
We wish that she were wiser,
More capable and kind.
Her path we're always stalking
To criticize her talking,
Her clothes, her ways of walking,
Her manners and her mind.
We say, "Oh, high-tighty!
She's frivolous and flighty,
And all her ways are mighty!
Undignified to see;
She dances and she chatters,
Our golden rule she shatters,
And laughs at serious matters
With unabated glee!"
We chide and we correct her,
We shadow and detect her,
We study and dissect her,
With all her smiles and tears,
And find, on looking o'er her
(And learning to adore her),
She's just like girls before her
For twenty thousand years!

THOSE who dispute and argue for and against the "American design" question, leave out of it the most important, because the controlling, factor, which is that the fashions are not made by the designers. They are made by the women who wear the fashions. A designer may be as great as Paul Poiret, or Callot, or Cheruit, to choose those of opposing schools, and yet, without the guidance of a woman of power, these designs fall flat.

Paris recognizes this controlling factor in the launching of a style, but America has always had a tendency to put the power in the hands of the man or woman who designed the frock. Naturally, much credit goes to that source. The inspiration lies there. But the final success does not lie there. It rests absolutely with the woman or women who exploit it before a curious and admiring public.

The actress who wears a Callot frock in a new play is responsible for the fashion for that frock in Europe as well as in America later on, though America may be unaware of it. It is the celebrated woman of pleasure who starts the vogue for the hat that Suzanne Talbot created. It is the leader of smart Paris society who begins the popularity of the evening wrap created by Cheruit and copied in a dozen wholesale houses in lower New York. Eve Lavalliere gave the cachet to the slim boyishness of Poiret's brain children and Inadora Duncan showed how this Greek adaptation is suited to the large figure of many modern women.

No designer, no matter how great he or she is, is big enough to be independent of one or more women who are in the public eye. The fact is testified to by the importance attributions concerning social happenings, intended for publication in the society department of The Times, must be submitted to the editor not later than 6 o'clock p. m. Friday of each week. (Exceptions will be allowed only in cases where the events occurred later than the time mentioned.)

atched to the appearance at events attended by society, or of the various mannequins who wear the designs created by some celebrated house. And it is well known that any house, possibly excepting that of Worth, will strive to the utmost to present their clothes on a celebrated personage rather than sell them to anyone who wants to buy.

They realize that in this manner, and in only this manner, is fashion made. It is the fashionable women in smart European society who, getting their ideas from Paris, co-ordinating there with the designers, and choosing a line from one frock, a silhouette from another, a sleeve here and a sash there, arrive at an early conception of a gown that immediately becomes the fashion.

It is this ensemble that the American dressmakers take up later in the season after they have spread broadcast the first and untried designs brought over from the August and February openings.
