The Cock of the Walk

Said Madame Gray Hen to the Cock of the Walk,
"Look here, Mr. Rooster, it's my turn to talk.
Be done with your strutting, you lazy spur-legs;
Get right down to business and sit on these eggs.
For centuries past you have taken your ease,
When I, helpless creature, was cramping my knees
In some lonely spot hatching out broods of chickens.
While you did the crowing and raising the dickens.

"I've seen you with others—but no matter when,
What's good for the rooster is good for the hen.
From this time henceforward I want you to know,
My voice will be heard, for I'm learning to crow."
Then, summoning other gray hens to the spot,
She told them to "strike," and they chorused "why not?"

So poor Mr. Rooster just curled up his legs
In humble surrender and sat on the eggs.

His temper was not of the pleasantest mood,
But, giving him credit, he hatched out the brood;
And when the sun set all the hilltops aglow,
He left his wee charges and marched off to crow;
A hawk circled 'round, and in one fearful swoop
Swept all the young chickens right out of the coop.

The farmer beheld the transaction and sighed,
"I see this is race—I mean—fowl suicide,
When hens start to crow and roosters to hatch,
With not one left to teach chickens to scratch.
They need a good lesson before the fad spreads."
So grasping his hatchet he chopped off their heads.
He then had to broil them, himself, on the coals,
For both wife and daughter had gone to the polls.
He pondered awhile and then, scratching his head,
"I'm sorry I killed that poor rooster," he said.
