CREW REFUSES TO WORK

Because the boatswain on the French bark Cornil Bart was too rough, the crew refused to turn to the other morning when the ship was about ready to clear for the United Kingdom.

The crew contended that they had made a trip with the boatswain from the old country and had been bullied about long enough and so put their several feet down, gesticulated and informed the skipper there was "nothing doing."

HAD SORROWFUL CHRISTMAS

"I'll be home in to eat Christmas dinner with you," wrote Captain Charles Jackson, veteran skipper of the Matson bark R. P. Ritchet, to his wife. The letter was mailed from Honolulu just before the ship set sail from San Francisco.

On Christmas day the ship docked in the Golden Gate and Mrs. Ritchet was at the dock to meet her husband. Her surprise was a pitiful one. Captain Ritchet had died on the trip.

MAY SELL ANVIL

One of Last Boats to Still Remain Idle There are rumors of the sales of several boats which formerly made this port.

There are rumors of the sales of several boats which formerly made this port. A Portland paper says: One more of the idle coast fleet remaining in the harbor and which has kept company with the Golden Gate at the Oregon Water Power dock is the gasoline schooner Anvil and there have been rumors during the past season of her prospective sale to be used in Alaskan waters.
