THE MAN OF CHOICE

Agnes wants a millionaire. With coaches and a car. Who'll take her all around with him And travel near and far.

Mabel wants a manly man. Broad shouldered, strong and tall, White Nellies wants a stylish dude, Who'll come at beck and call.

Sarah wants a publisher, And lots and lots of space, And Carrie wants a handsome man, With happy, smiling face.

Martha's choice a preacher is, With hair a glossy jet, And Nancy says she'll have to take Whomever she can get.

Mary aims so very high, She'll never be content With any man upon this earth, Except the president.

I'm not sure I want to wed, But if I do, I pray I'll get a man who's WISE enough To let me have MY WAY.

HOW ridiculous it is that men and women should spend their lives in posing, trying to appear to the world something they are not. They sometimes succeed in even fooling themselves, but they cannot fool the world for any length of time. It is a truism, "you can fool some of the people some of the time but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time."

In a small community this is especially true, but it is also true in the big cities. "We may silver plate ourselves and look like sterling silver for a while, but we will rub off in spots, and at the wrong time. In excitement, in overdoing our role, in trying too hard to create some impression, the imitation will be sure to come out when we least expect it, and we will stand for that we are, posers. And yet there are people who are brave enough to silver plate themselves, thinking that by posing they can carry it through.

Would it not be awful if, as at a masquerade party, at a certain hour we were obliged to drop our pose, and stand revealed to the world our real selves. If for instance we have been playing the role of Lady Bonifant, while we are really Shylocks. If we have been posing before the world as open handed, generous, charitable while at heart we are mean and stingy to the last degree to those who depend on us for benevolence and generosity. Perhaps we are smiling, cordial, and sweet to the world, and snarly and fault-finding at home.

Many who have mean, petty characteristics, are posing before the world as all that is attractive and lovely. Some are giving the world the impression that they are millionaires while they owe the butcher, the baker, the milk man. Girls are posing as belles; as the newspapers told the other day—a girl who paid someone to send her candy, and letters which were supposed to come from an ardent admirer. Men are trying to bluff off another with their success in business, or in the amount of money they are making. They have expensive offices and homes, trying to make others think they are financial successes.

Nature invariably blinks at what we really are, and it is seldom one can carry a pose through to the end. How often we hear it said "how they have changed." "What a pity the man has come to such a bad end." He has not changed, it is only the silver-plating that has worn off. Something has interfered with his pose, and he or she stand revealed in their true worth.

We may be impressed for a time, we may even be tempted to follow someone we think is the real sterling article, we may be disappointed and disillusioned when we find they are only silver plated, says May Tallmire. But it should teach us to stand for what we really are. To at least try to find a helpful mental picture of the desire sent out of what we would like to be. Every condition in life comes as a result of a desire, and if we hitch to it the will power we would not waste our not, but make it a creative force that will help us to be what we want to be.
