VESEL SENDS S. O. S. CALL

STEAM SCHOONER CENTRALIA IN DISTRESS THIS MORNING

[By Associated Press to Coos Bay Times.]

Has Not Since Been Located by Other Boats—Yosemite Is Reported Leaking

The steam schooner Centralia sent out an S. O. S. call for help at 6 o'clock this morning. All efforts to get in communication with the vessel after this time have proven fruitless, though it is known that the oil tank steamer Buck and also the steam schooner Yosemite are cruising in the vicinity, supposed to be about 25 miles northwest of Yaquina. The Yosemite herself is in a leaking condition.

HEARD THE WHISTLES

The destination of the Centralia is not known here. Word from the steamship Buck is to the effect that about six o'clock, it was then quite dark, four sharp and short blasts of a ship's whistle were heard. Then there was silence. It is understood that the Buck was close enough to discern the outlines of the Centralia but lost her shortly after this.

Location Guessed At

The location of the Centralia was guessed at, though it is believed it was very close to the position stated. The ships are cruising there in hopes of picking up any life boats that may be afloat, providing the Centralia has foundered.

Is Steam Schooner

The Centralia is a steam schooner of 487 gross tonnage, 160.5 feet in length, 36 feet breadth and with a depth of 12.5 feet. She carries a crew of 19 men. In 1902 she was built at Alameda and San Francisco is her home port.

No Call for Help

The Yosemite, the vessel that is leaking, is of 927 gross tons, carries a crew of 26 men and is 193 feet in length. Inasmuch as she has not dispatched a call for help it is not believed that she is in a sinking condition.
