College Education A Good Thing.

In an address to the graduating class of Cornell University, Gov. Roosevelt said: "There has been a great deal of discussion recently—I am thankful to say that I believe it is a one-sided kind—due to the statements of certain gentlemen, who have amassed large fortunes, to the effect that they do not believe in a college education. This country could better afford to lose every man in it who has amassed a large fortune than to lose one-half of its college bred men. We can get along without the men of immense fortunes. Sometimes we can do very well indeed without them, but we could not do the best work possible to be done save for the men who took the chances offered to train themselves so that they can do the fine delicate work which must be done if we are to raise our civilization above a purely material basis.

"If your college training teaches you to think that you belong to a little select set of people apart and unsympathetic with the rest of your countrymen, then it is an unmitigated curse, and it turns you out useless to your country and to yourself; but if your college turns you out feeling that you are exactly like your fellows, save that on you rests the heavier responsibility, because you have had exceptional advantages; if it makes you realize more keenly than ever before your sense of identity with them, and your sense of duty to the state; if it gives you keener tools with which to do your work, and does not divert your mind from the fact that you are to do that work; if your college education has done all this, it has made you immeasurably better citizens than you were before.

"Above all, do not become of the class of so-called highly educated and cultured who sneer at American institutions and American customs. If you recognize a fault, come forward and expose it, and strive to remedy it. Do not become one of the class who lose faith in the ability of Americans to govern either themselves or their islands."
