ROBERT BONNER'S SUCCESS

In 1844 a young Irishman came to New York with seventy dollars in his pocket. He had made it by hard work as a journeyman printer, and was determined not to lose it. For safety he placed it in a bank. Time passed, and he went to see that his money was secure. He handed the clerk his bank-book, and when it was returned to him the words "Three dollars" were written in red ink on the credit page.

"What does this mean?" asked the printer, astonished. "I never made that three dollars!"

"No," replied the clerk, "but your money did."

"That settled it," said the printer, telling the story afterward. "I learned that day that money makes money, so I saved."

The printer's name was Robert Bonner. He soon became foreman of a pressroom in New York, and increased his income by acting as correspondent for a number of journals. Saving every cent possible, he acquired capital enough to buy a small commercial publication which became in his hands a successful family paper. When Mr. Bonner had laid a firm foundation for his fortunes, he made it a practice to get anything that he wanted, if it seemed to him worth getting. His favorite maxim came from Emerson: "O discontented man, whatever you want, pay the price and take it."

One day it occurred to him that Edward Everett ought to write for his paper.

"You couldn't get Everett to write at any price," said his counsellors. "Wait and see," said Bonner.

It was at the time when Everett was lecturing on Washington for the benefit of the fund for the purchase of Mount Vernon. Mr. Bonner at once wrote him that he should like to subscribe ten thousand dollars to the fund, if Mr. Everett would write something for him once a week. The orator closed with the offer.

On another occasion a friend remarked that it was too bad Charles Dickens would never write for American papers.

"Wait," replied Bonner. He sat down, made out a draft for five thousand dollars, and enclosing it in a polite note to the great novelist, requested a story. The story came, and Dickens asked his friends whether American publishers all did business in that fashion.

Mr. Bonner was celebrated as one of the most persistent advertisers in this country.

"There's nothing on earth," he would say, "like advertising. If you have something to sell, advertise it."

Early in his career he secured a story which he considered exceptionally popular. To advertise it, he bought eight pages of a popular daily paper. His display consisted in repeating a single statement of the forthcoming publication with bewildering iteration.

A few hours after the advertisement appeared, Mr. Bonner's physician hurried up the steps of his house. "Is anything the matter with Mr. Bonner?" he inquired, anxiously.

Mr. Bonner happened to be in the hall. "I think not," he replied.

"Then tell me," demanded the doctor, "what in the face of nature all this means? Are you in your right mind?"

Mr. Bonner laughed. "There," he exclaimed, "I knew that advertisement would do its work! Every man who reads the paper this morning will make the same inquiry. It's grand!"

Mr. Bonner's honesty was invincible. He once bought a house in Westchester. The agent assured him there was no danger of malaria, and every householder in the vicinity supported the assertion. Mr. Bonner, however, promptly fell a victim to the disease. A day or two afterward an advertisement appeared, offering the place for sale. The place, it said, was the only spot in the country where malaria could be caught. Every real estate agent in the country would testify that this was so, and yet the place would be sacrificed at a reasonable rate. Somehow or other the place was sold. Mr. Bonner's work deserved success. He said to the assistant editors of his paper: "You shall not print a single word in this paper which my mother could not read aloud without shame to her children.—Youth's Companion."
